Editor's Note.

The Editor desires to thank his many correspondents for the assistance they have rendered him in the compilation of the facts recorded in this volume, and begs the indulgence of his Lancashire friends for any errors of omission, or commission, which may be noted. It is scarcely to be expected that a County Biographical Dictionary of this magnitude can be wholly free from reproach, prepared, as it has been, in times presenting peculiar difficulties, and under circumstances which have entailed much delay, and unusual labour, in completing the work as it stands.

Suggestions for further Biographical works; Local or County Histories; Rolls of Honour; Trade, Manufacturing, or Technical Publications; or volumes of Artistic or Literary character, are invited. They will be carefully considered. All such communications should be addressed: Editor (Personal), Westminster Publishing Company, 10, 11, 12, Ivy Lane, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

Introduction.

LANCASHIRE.

OF the counties of England, Lancashire stands first in population, second in rateable value, and sixth in area. These are merely figures of comparison. The pre-eminence of Lancashire can be stated in more arrestive terms.

As an industrial centre, Lancashire has many competitors but no rival. Within what we call " the Manchester area," which occupies the south-eastern corner and includes sections of adjoining counties, we have a gathering of people larger than is found assembled in any other locality in the world. Every year London is adding to her numbers a population roughly equal to that of a town of average size, but even London, despite her long start and peculiar advantages, as capital of the Empire and her proximity to the Continent, does not now provide occupation and sustenance for such an immense army of workers as can be counted within a twenty or thirty mile radius of Manchester. New York has no family of like proportions ; Paris, Berlin, Rome, and Buenos Ayres are still further in the rear.*

Iron, coal, cotton, and ships ! By these agencies of man's energy, discovery, and constructive skill, and within a period of considerably less than a couple of centuries, Lancashire has positively leapt into a position of unexampled activity, prosperity, and influence.

" What Lancashire thinks to-day——"

Save when her trade has been imperilled, Lancashire has been too agreeably occupied making money to bother much with politics, either as a career for her youth or as an occupation for her " Captains of Industry " of mature age. Her proudest plea has been to be left alone. Having regard,therefore, to the numbers of her population, she has given fewer sons to the tortuous, often unavailing (and be it admitted in a whisper, the largely unremunerative), processes of shaping Governments and making laws, than many a less important county.

Exceptions, of course, there have been—recent and conspicuous exceptions like those of Gladstone and Bright, to make mention of only two belonging to the trading classes ; but even these great names, to which those of Lord Morley, of Blackburn, and the Prime Minister (Mr. David Lloyd George, M.P.)† may now, not inappropriately, be added, only prove the rule regarding a gathering of people so large as to be counted by the million.

And yet, with representation or without representation in the highest councils of the State, Lancashire money and Lancashire brains have constituted

* I wonder how many Englishmen are fully conscious of this amazing growth of Lancashire. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, one in rather more than every twenty-four persons living in England was a resident of Lancashire ; at the close of the century the figures were, roughly, one in eight. If it were humanly possible for the county to maintain " the lightning advance " there would be, at the close of the present epoch, one-third of the entire population of England settled in Lancashire.

† In claiming Mr. Lloyd George as a Lancashire man, it is worth remembering that, apart from any question as to place of birth, a large proportion of the place-names of Lancashire are insoluble without reference to the native, or Celtic speech, of his Welsh progenitors. There have been four Lancashire-born Premiers since 1832, viz., Sir Robert Peel, the Earl of Derby (the "Rupert of Debate"), Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. Lloyd George, covering in all about twenty-two years out of eighty-five.

for many years past the sheet anchor of British politics. Never has England had occasion to regret a decision, based upon the homely wisdom and sterling common sense of her Lancashire advisers.

Why? Whence?

The questions frame themselves—Why is so large a share of England's industrial activities concentrated in Lancashire? Who are these people? And what is the ancestry of the men and women (the sexes have a call for independent mention because no otherwhere have the women made a more substantial contribution to the common purse) who have turned Nature from ways of slothful indolence, and converted an ancient land, consisting largely of scrub, forest, moss (or what we more generally call marsh), and sand dunes, into a hive of industry, intersected with highways, waterways, and railways?

For answer, let the pages of this book tell their own tale, and the two thousand or more biographies inscribed herein be their own witness to the truth.

THE term "Lancashire," meaning the shire, share, or division of Great Britain of which the principal or county town is Lancaster, has a restricted significance, inasmuch as no shire court was ever held. As a Duchy and County Palatine, Lancashire possessed for many centuries its own special courts. Certain of these tribunals were lost to us, as recently as the passing of the Judicature Acts of 1873-1876. But courts still survive—of which the Court of the Passage of Liverpool may be quoted as a convenient example—to which I venture to attribute a history that links us, in all probability, to the Danish-Norwegian settlement of, say, the tenth century, or roughly, four hundred years earlier than the mandate of Edward III. to his son, John o' Gaunt.

The Origin of the Name.

The question as to the origin of the place-name "Lancaster" has been responsible for a rich crop of speculation. The last gathering is as follows:—

"Lone, lonely, and alone come from 'i laun,' which means banishment, and those thus outlawed formed the brigands of the hill districts. We thus get Lunesdale, Lune, and Lancaster" (S. W. Partington, "The Danes in Lancashire and Yorkshire," 1909, p. 55).

Mr. Partington has written a book that deserves to be much better known; it ought to find a place in every Lancastrian's library. In his enthusiasm, however, for the Scandinavian adventurers, who came to plunder us, but from whom we got, as a free gift, more than we ever lost in battle, inasmuch as they brought us a spirit of daring, and notions of government of the highest order of excellence—in short, qualities of blood which their own country could ill afford to lose—he has entirely overlooked our earlier dependence upon another dominant people—the Brythonic branch of the Celtic race.

The "caster" or "castre" is a legacy of our Roman conquerors, meaning a military camp, a fortified place and, towards the end of their occupation, a castle. For the rest, we must turn for light to our Celtic studies.

"Naming" was Creation.

At one time all settlements were made on the banks of a river. When the settlement became a town, it took its name from the river, because the river had an identity in priority to the town. Our ancestors conferred a name on everything that dominated their intelligence—earth, sea, air, and sky.

The mountain was " named," the river was " named," most of all, the death-dealing stone hammer or sword of a valiant in battle was " named." To " name " a thing, was to call it into a living, or spiritual existence. A mountain did not become the depository of any super-human, or supernatural agency, until it was named. An upstanding stone possessed no active, or living presence, until that presence was, by approved ritual, conferred thereon. To suggest that our far-away forefathers " worshipped " stones, under the conviction that the stone had ceased to be a stone, and had become a god, is the veriest trash and nonsense.

The calling of things into existence, by conferring upon them names, is exemplified in the Bible narrative of the creation : " And God called the light Day, and the darkness He called Night " (Genesis i. 5, et seq.). " And Adam gave names " (ii. 19). In the ritual of baptism we confer upon a child a name, and it is the teaching of the Church, that the infant ceases to be a frail creature of the flesh, on becoming the depositary of an immortal spirit. In Egypt, the ceremony of the Sun-God Rā accepting, and acknowledging the Queen's baby, as of divine origin and blood, was practised by the priests of Heliopolis, with appropriate prayers and obvious material advantages to themselves, several thousand years before the present era.

The " naming " and thereby conferring thereon creation, or spiritual existence, is, in truth, world-old and world-wide. There is no branch of the human family that has not yielded to the doctrine.

The Fragrance of Metaphor.

Locke, the English scholar, penetrated the fundamental idea with startling astuteness, though the discovery was not recognised until long afterwards. He was the first to show that names are not the signs of the things themselves, but always the signs of our concepts of them. It has also been prettily said, that our language is crowded with metaphors, which shed a poetic fragrance over the simplest form of speech. " Man transfers his own circumstances, relations, and properties to inanimate nature " (Curtius, " Principles of Greek Etymology, translated by Wilkins and England," 1886, Vol. I., p. 128).

The Soul of the Silvery Stream.

There are several rivers named Lune. Whether the Celts imparted the flavour of their own poetic minds, or yielded to the superstition of a still earlier people, we do not know. We may never know. We suspect that the Celt in his westward flight, at about the period of the dawn of history, learned as much as he ever taught. He was, in his very soul, extremely susceptible to the play of magic art. At fall of night, when the rain was beating heavily against the door, the wind whistling in fierce anger under the thatch, and the embers of the fire in the chollagh were burning low, his superstitious nature fell an easy victim to a woman's wiles. Any old wife's tale was good enough for him, so long as it presumed to reveal facts, which his own stout heart and valour in battle could not disprove.

The Goddess of the White Waters.

That " Lune " is our abbreviation of " Aw-lune " or " Alauna," meaning white water, does not bring us to the secret of the concept. Our ancestors meant more than " silvery stream " would imply, because it was an age when there was hardly a person, a place, or a thing, of which the essential part might not be mentally detached, and feared, or adored as a god.

The moon was personified in the name Luna, and all mythology, with its common source of origin, shows us that the sacred orb of night was identified with various goddesses, and that the white, pale, or silvery light was an emblem of coldness or chastity.

Boundaries.

Lancashire is one of the six northern counties of England, and in relation to these neighbours, with whom it existed at one time in close organic unity, occupies the south-western corner. Furness, or "Lancashire across the sands," is bounded on the north and east by the counties of Cumberland and Westmorland and the waters of Lake Windermere, Morecambe Bay lying to the south and the Irish Sea on the west. The West Riding of Yorkshire and the southernmost ridges of the Pennine Range form, in general detail, the eastern boundary of the county. On the south lies the county of Chester, the River Mersey constituting the dividing line for nearly fifty miles. The coast on the west (for the most part low-lying and flat for a considerable distance inland) is washed by the Irish Sea.

The greatest length of the county, from north-west to south-east, measures eighty-six miles. The extreme breadth is obtained in the south by a line drawn from west to east, extending to about forty-five miles. From Formby Point to the boundary line at Oldham we register forty-three miles.

Area.

Various figures are given as to the acreage. Some estimates are as high as 1,299,816, others as low as 1,055,395; the discrepancy being due to the difference in the area included in the calculation, the inclusion, or non-inclusion, of foreshore, rivers, fresh-water lakes, and what is called "the registration area."

Population.

The population according to the last estimate gives a total of 4,767,832 compared with 4,437,518 five years before, but as the increase is calculated on the basis of a natural progression based on the average of the last decade, the figures now current are subject to the correction of the next Census in 1921.

Divisions and Representation.

The great divisions of the county are the six hundreds—Lonsdale (north and south of the sands), Amounderness, Leyland, Blackburn, Salford, and West Derby. The ecclesiastical parishes or districts, wholly or in part within the county, number 787. There are sixteen Parliamentary cities, towns and boroughs, represented in the House of Commons by thirty-five members, The county divisions, which have twenty-three seats allotted to them, bring up the Parliamentary representation of the county to fifty-eight.

Three Sections.

Geographically, the county is formed of two, or possibly three, distinct areas:—

1st. The large industrial area lying between the Mersey and the Ribble.

2nd. The more distinctly agricultural land lying between the Ribble and Morecambe Bay, and then

3rd. That kind of "after-thought" or "make weight" across the sands.

These distinctions frequently obtrude upon our notice when we come to trace the history from an ethnological, a commercial, a political, and an ecclesiastical point of view.

In the Beginning.

Geology is only a new science. In its modern aspect it dates from 1830, when Sir Charles Lyell produced his "Principles" of the new learning. The service which geology is rendering to mankind has one remarkable expression—the call it makes upon almost all other sciences, to render it aid, in grappling with the variety of problems which it encounters, in an examination of the crust on earth, on which we move, and have our being. Hence geology as "the borrowing science."

Nowhere does geology reveal a greater tale of wonder han in Lancashi e. For instance, far inland and at elevations high up from the level of the sea, we find, in the rocks, the evidence of forms of life that could only have existed in the bosom of great waters. There was a time, therefore, when most of the land we denominate Lancashire, must have been below the level of the sea. "The borrowing science" proves to us, that all that was then visible, above the chill and often frozen waters, were a few of the higher elevations, and that these were usually covered with snow.

Then, down by the edge of the sea, we encounter facts which appear to tell quite a different story. Here is the evidence that at some period of our history, the land must have been at least fifty feet higher than it is to-day—the remains of great forests on the seashore, below high-water level, between Preston and Liverpool, and again at Leasowe, between the Mersey and he Dee, on the Wirral peninsula.

Neither phenomenon, however, is a whit more remarkable than that other one to which we rightly trace all our prosperity, viz., that far down beneath our feet, there should be "fields," now of coal, but fields upon which, in lieu of the impenetrable darkness, in which they now lie, the sun once shone in all his splendour.

The truth is, that we are only beginning to realise the immense age of the earth, that many millions of years have been necessary to produce the changes of which geology has made us aware, and that what we regard, at a first glance, as evidence of nature in confusion, has reference to widely separat d epochs.

The Early Man.

Man has existed in England for tens of thousands of years. In Kent we have gathered up out of the sand on the banks of the Medway, the remains of a human being who walked this England of ours, not less than seventy thousand years ago. In Lancashire we have proof of man's existence at a period when he had no other weapon of offence, or defence, than implements of unpolished stone. From the fact that the early neolithic man has left his flint clippings on floors varying in depth from one to ten feet, on sites of high elevation, and at the eastern limits of the county, we conclude that he came westward, possibly under the pressure of an adversary, armed with the war spear and the polished stone axe.

Many a Trackless Morass.

The early man may have chosen these high elevations for his habitation and workshop for no other reason than this—because the valleys were no better than veritable swamps. The balance of probability, however, favours the idea that he chose the hills because they were better observation posts, the enemy being both man and beast.

West of the Pennines was many a trackless morass, interspersed with great stretches of land covered with forests and low-lying scrub. The brown bear, wild boar, stag, wolf, and reindeer found shelter (and to a considerable extent their food) in the forest, and man had to replenish his larder by trapping these wild animals by his superior cunning, rather than by the character of his weapons of offence, or the strength of his arm.

"The Children of the Night."

Who was this nameless adventurer in our land? What were his mental and physical characteristics?

Many ethnologists attach high value to these questions, holding that his influence upon our temperament, ways of thought, and stamina, were more, rather than less, than that of either, or both of the two immensely powerful Celtic invasions in which he was destined to be overwhelmed, and finally absorbed. In various parts of Great Britain (particularly in Derbyshire), and in Ireland (particularly in the westernmost counties), the scientific observer in pursuit of dolichocephalous types, has been struck by the survival of these characteristics—a people dark-skinned, dark-haired, dark-eyed, small in stature (perhaps no more than five feet two inches in the males, and four feet ten inches in the females), heads of a long, narrow shape, " strangely foreign looking." These were the distinguishing characteristics of the people, who were in sole occupation of Britain, at the period of the Stone Age.

Ethnologically they are termed " Iberians." " We have found reasons to believe that the Iberians formed the primary stock from which the existing inhabitants of Great Britain and the West of Europe are derived " (Macnamara, " The Origin and Character of the British People," 1900, p. 60).

In Lancashire, despite all the crossing, and intermixture, of the intervening years, the presence of these non-Aryan elements is affirmed, and it is assumed that they are recurring survivals, or reassertions, of the ancient stock, remnants of that short, and swarthy people, whose tribal names were equivalent, according to the ancient tales of Erin, to " Darkness," " Night," or " Mist."

The Birth of Civilisation.

The people of the second great advance belonged to the Bronze Age. The men were tall, and fair, and large-limbed. The women were well nourished. Their faces were distinguished by a heavy jaw, and a prominent chin. The skull was of a round, short shape. Altogether, the new arrivals were of a type " that still prevails so largely among the modern inhabitants of Denmark and in the Wendish and Slovonian countries " (Elton, " Origins of English History," 1890, p. 140).

Judging from the contents of their burial places in Yorkshire, their invasion of British territory was not regarded, by the earlier people in possession, as a disaster. The round barrows of this age, contain an almost equal proportion of long-shaped, and short-shaped skulls, while the evidence of inter-marriage, is found in the presence of skulls that combine the features of both peoples.

This second invasion of Britain is sometimes called " the van of the Aryan army," as combining elements of Scandinavian and Low German descent. But it is not a matter of any certainty that this second invasion was Aryan at all. If the earlier invasion suggested a link with the people who now inhabit the Basque provinces, this second invasion provided elements of affinity with the Finnic tribes, who were separated in history, blood, and speech from the bulk of the inhabitants of Europe.

The question, however, cannot be discussed here. My purpose is largely served if, in the face of some of our historians, I show that, at the period of the Bronze Age, the people settled in the northern counties of England, were not mere savages, or a gathering of hunters and fishers, or yet a people in the pastoral or migratory stage.

We have abundant evidence to show that they grew some kind of grain, lived in regular villages, owned flocks and herds, and knew enough about weaving to fabricate clothes of linen and wool. In a word, they had advanced towards the refinements of civilised life thus far, long years before either the descent of the Celtic hordes, or the arrival of the Romans.

Waves of Invasion.

The pressure always came from the east, or south-east. The people of Yorkshire, vanquished in their own territory, became the explorers and new settlers in Lancashire.

At first the invader was probably of like blood to his brother in possession.

He was the conqueror for no better reason than this—he had crossed "sand bridge" and sea, "burnt his boat," and must make himself a home. Then the invader was of wholly different race; he came with the will to rule and the power to strike. Weapons of stone gave place to those of keener edge, of polished stone, of bronze, and lastly of iron.

Nothing could withstand this new race, whose attack was made strong, not merely by a superiority of tools of conquest, but by a certain genius for military strategy, of which unity of action and the wild, sudden, tempestuous onrush upon one vulnerable point, were conspicuous features.

The Coming of the Celt.

The dominating stranger, who came with such a magnificent appreciation of his own proud destiny, was a Celt. Whether the westward trend of his footsteps was dictated by the superstition that was ripening in his blood, that he must ultimately reach the land where the Sun reposed at fall of day (just as other peoples sought his cradle in the east), whether he was animated by a love of conquest or adventure, or merely by curiosity (always in him a marked characteristic), or whether he moved westward because he must move somewhere, and this was the line of the least resistance, it is not necessary here to attempt any enquiry or to hazard any guess.

We are dealing with a period largely prior to the rise of authenticated history. What we do know is, that from the moment the Celts emerge into the light of history, their collective trend, omitting diversions southwards into Italy and Spain and one backward move when they established the little state of the Galatians in Asia Minor, was ever towards the west. "Going West" is a phrase still familiar on our tongue. It means now, what it meant then, a journey into realms unknown.

The Fight for Existence.

The fight for existence was insistent. The changing character of the animals, with which man had to do battle in that early day, is revealed in a passage of Poseidonius of Apamea, the most learned and influential Stoic. He is supposed to have visited Britain about 100 B.C. After saying that "we slept on the ground and took our meals seated on straw," he goes on regarding the inhabitants: "They live chiefly on milk and all kinds of flesh, that of the swine, which they eat both fresh and salted, being the most common. Their swine are kept in the fields and are of remarkable height, strength, and swiftness; to persons unaccustomed to approach them, they are almost as dangerous as wolves."

The Pig.

In a savage state, the pig found his food round the feet of the great oak and among the scrub where the deadly rattlesnake lay in wait. A diet of acorns purifies and enriches the flesh, both the fat and the lean. The pig's swiftness in attack, his weight, length of leg and great strength enable us to appreciate the dangers of the chase, when man was equipped with no other weapon of attack than a stone hammer; whilst his astonishing capacity for digesting, as a dainty morsel, that which would poison any other animal, helps us to realise the basis of that mingling of hostility and veneration for the pig which we find in all religions. That the flesh of the pig should be taboo in some families ("Black Pig" being another name for the devil), whilst with most people he should yield the most appetising diet (pork being the food of heroes and kings), can only be explained as one more link of common origin with the far-away East.

The Tale of the Phœnician Sailors.

Homer makes no mention of the Celts, but he provides another clue to the extent of his knowledge. Both the Greeks and the Romans were disposed to designate a people by the metal which their territory produced. The Greeks did not then know of "Britain," but the Phœnician sailors had made them acquainted with the *Cassi*terides, or "Tin Islands," and as this use of a Celtic word and reference to tin occurs both in the Homeric epic and in the name of many Celtic tribes, we have strong testimony pointing in one direction.

The evidence, therefore, "seems to justify the view that in the ninth century B.C. the Gadhelic branch of the Celtic family was established in the British Isles and engaged in the production of tin" (Dinan, "Monumenta Historica Celtica," 1911, p. 3).

We are in a region largely of guesswork when we attempt to determine the period when either of the two branches of the family of Celtica began to explore and conquer other parts of the Kingdom. There is not much reason to suppose that the Celts penetrated Lancashire, until several centuries after they had made their important conquests and discoveries in Cornwall, and the Scilly Isles.

History is beginning to lift the veil from the past, when about the first century of the present era, we have the knowledge of Ptolemy, the geographer, that certain tribes of the numerous Brigantes had settlements on the upper banks of our three great waterways—the Mersey (called the Estuary Belisama from the name of a Gaulish goddess), the Ribble (Haven of the Setantii), and the Estuary Moricambe.

Roman Strategy.

The first Roman invasion of Britain was in 55 B.C., but not till nearly a century later did the subjugation of our people become a definite project. In Lancashire, the conquest was the work of Agricola, who, making use of the great estuaries, achieved successes, solely by reason of the mobility which our waterways gave him.

Extolling the Roman.

Historians full of enthusiasm for classic lore and strangely indifferent to the conspicuous heritage of their own blood, devote many eloquent pages to the beneficent work performed by the Romans in England. Never a word, however, regarding the reverse of the shield, the degrading laws affecting the status of woman for instance, which disfigured the statute book of our realm down to the last quarter of the Nineteenth Century, and of which even now, the spirit and often the letter of the old enactments remain.

"The part played by the Celtic race . . . has been unduly obscured in popular thought," says Mr. T. W. Rolleston in his "Myths and Legends of the Celtic Race" (1911, p. vii.). How far that part has been "unduly obscured" a couple of examples from "popular thought" will show.

Depreciating the Celt.

James Croston, F.S.A., in a contribution to Richard Wright Procter's "Memorials of Manchester Streets" (1874), writes of "the half-savage dwellers of the ancient Mancenion" and of "the undisciplined valour" of men "who, if they knew not how to fight, knew at least how valiant men should die."

Not know how to fight! This, of a race whose genius for war was such, that at one time their territory extended from the Black Sea to the Atlantic Ocean, from the Baltic to the Straits of Gibraltar, a people who had formed an alliance with Alexander the Great in Greece, conquered the Etruscans in Italy, sacked Rome, and driven the Carthaginians from Spain!

The Celt's Fatal Deficiency.

The Celt has grave deficiencies of character; undisciplined valour, however, has never been one of them. The long and oft repeated folly of the Celt has been at least twofold—first, lack of cohesion in the hour of triumph, and second, a slavish dependence upon priestly counsels. Human nature could not have evolved two more deadly enemies, and again and again they have proved his undoing. If the Celt cannot trace the outline of an enemy on any horizon, he soon discovers (or fancies he has discovered) one within the circle of his own dun. And he has no armoury against the shaft of cunning—call it mysticism, wonder, charm, or superstition, as you will.

The Old Tale Retold.

Then we have Lieut.-Col. Henry Fishwick, in his otherwise admirable summary, " A History of Lancashire," adopting the time-honoured disparagement of the Celt.

He tells us that Agricola made efforts to accustom the conquered race to the comforts and luxuries of Roman citizens, to build temples, houses, and baths. He sees Roman tradition in the beating of the parish bounds, the May Day festival, the marriage ring, the veil, the wedding gift, and even the cake. " Our funeral customs are also Roman—the cypress and the yew, the sprinkling of dust on the coffin, the flowers on the grave, and the wearing of black clothes " (for which E. Sanderson's " History of England," p. 19, is quoted as authority).

For nearly four centuries the Romans were in occupation, and at the close of that period, the Lancashire people " must have been a very different race, to those half-naked barbarians, who fought so desperately to defend their soil against the invading legions " (pp. 39, 40). And then, as a last shot, " although the ancient Briton was not quite an untutored savage," still, the Romans showed us how to make roads, build houses of stone, and much else besides.

Conflicting Testimony.

The contrast to this picture is found in the pages of those writers who, in repelling an outrageous libel, are in grave danger of lapsing into exaggeration, or positive error, on the other side. The fact is, we have no native record of Britain either prior to, or contemporaneous with, the Roman occupation. We must glean our information, therefore, from the pages of our enemy. Surely he will not be tempted to exalt us above our due !

Broken Swords from Celtic Cemeteries.

Polybius, writing about 150 B.C., makes a great point of the inferior quality of the Celtic sword (a contradiction appears in his pages elsewhere, but this cannot be from the same hand). He, apparently, based his opinion on the information provided him by the Romans, who in ransacking Celtic cemeteries, dating in Cisalpine from 1000 B.C., were chagrined to find only bent swords. But bent swords have been dug up from Celtic graves in all parts of Europe, and archæologists have proved them to be of excellent metal, the handles and lower portion of the blade being often decorated with beautiful enamels, a form of work quite unknown to the Romans. But why did the Celts inter a bent sword with their dead ? Probably for the same reason as required the Greeks to place broken vases beside their dead (Reinach, " L'Anthropologie," 1906, pp. 321-336).

Our Priestly Masters.

Cæsar shows that in Britain we had judges and priests, and that these were our masters. They educated our youth, decided all controversies, public and private, and determined all questions of peace and war. Books were used for every purpose, except—the exception is very noteworthy in relation to another aspect of our study—for the setting down of priestly precepts.

These were of too sacred a character to be recorded in any volume. The youth of Gaul came to Britain for Druidical learning.

Extensive forests, mosses, and lakes impeded the Roman plans of conquest, but the conqueror found a people not only in the practice of agriculture along the sea front and far inland from the great watercourses, but shepherds tending their flocks on the mountain-side.

"Not quite a Savage"!

The "half-naked barbarian" had his kingdom divided into sections, which covered twenty-six of the present counties of England, together with smaller holdings, of which the boundaries were as well-known as "the marches of land" of a later day.

And the "not quite a savage" was such an efficient mechanic, that he could put into the field as many as four thousand war chariots at one time. The war chariot, with its death-dealing revolving scythe, had an axle of yew, turned in a lathe and polished, while the ends were studded with precious stones.

The Ritual of Great Days.

It is true that our Celtic ancestor often discarded all clothing in preparation for battle, but this course was dictated as much by ancient ritual, as for freedom of movement, amid our undergrowth of brambles. In times of peace, he wore a long sleeved waistcoat, trousers, and shoes; his dress being completed by a loose robe called a saik, held by buttons about the neck, and round the body by a decorated girdle.

Poseidonius was impressed with "the singularity" of the Celtic dress, particularly by the variegated flowers wrought on the tunics and the striped cloaks, richly ornamented with diamond-shaped floral patterns. He does not seem to have observed that we had not developed "stockens." Our need, however, was not so urgent. Not for a long time did we take to breeches that ended at the knee.

Rings and Gold Chains.

Men of station were distinguished by long gold chains, hanging from the neck and over the chest, and by rings which were worn on the middle or second finger of both hands. The hair was turned back over the crown of the head, where it fell in long curls below the neck. Beards were generally eschewed, but he moustache was permitted to grow to an inordinate length. A weirdly savage expression was thereby imparted to the face, and therein the fashion fulfilled its purpose.

The Social Distinctions of Celtica.

When, however, we are told that the ancient Briton lived in a mean hut, or cabin, constructed of hurdles, liberally daubed with clay and lime, Cæsar's testimony is worthy of remembrance. He found the dwellings of as good a standard as those of Gaul. Both Cæsar and Strabo recognised in all Celtic communities the existence of a sharp social distinction between the priests and the nobles on the one hand, and the common people on the other—between the true Celts, and the aboriginal populations subdued by them.

The great houses were constructed of stone, arched timbers, and a heavy thatch. If there were any "meanness," therefore, it was only by contrast with the lavish splendour of the palaces of the City of the Seven Hills.

The Romans had drinking vessels of silver and gold. The Briton made his of tin, or brass lined with tin. To the Romans, butter was a revelation of the cunning of the British dairy, a substance "of the nature of oil." The quern, or hand-mill, for grinding corn, was familiar to the Briton, but not so the water-wheel which the Romans introduced. The grinding of corn was the occupation of women. Cakes were baked on hot stones called gredíols, or griddles. There is reason for believing that every village had its public odyen, or oven, for the baking of loaves.

The Site of a Great City.

In Lancashire, the big centres of population stand to-day very near the spots where they stood before the first Roman set foot on the land. A chieftain's house was usually established on an elevated situation, overlooking a river lying to the south—the elevation as a look-out station, the river as an impediment to attack, looking towards the south, in order that the sun, casting its rays through the wide open casement, should heat the earthen floor, and leave an atmosphere of warmth for the succeeding night. The junction of two streams was a highly appreciated site for a settlement—hence Manchester "a spacious, rich, and populous Inland Town. . . . Situate upon a Rocky Clif, at the confluence of the Rivers Irk, and Irwell," to quote the legend at the foot of the panoramic view prepared by the Messrs. Samuel and Nathaniel Buck, and dated 1728.*

Where Authorities Differ.

Where authorities differ, the dispassionate reader usually concludes that the truth lies somewhere midway between the two extremes. In this instance, I venture to think, he will be wider of the mark than either of those whom he would thus correct.

The Roman testimony is indisputable. When it is in apparent conflict, two entirely different grades of social life in Britain are meant. The probability is that the culture and comfort of the dominating Celt were as represented, and that the mean conditions, under which the subject people lived, were not seriously exaggerated.

The Development of Spiritual Faith.

The principle of evolution is that development is a process so gradual as to be practically imperceptible. Changes are never violent. The old gives place to the new. Only when we come to compare results from widely separated epochs are we made conscious of the operation of the inevitable law of progression. I am satisfied that the principle which governs evolution in the organic world operates with equal force in the more or less impalpable world of faith and morals.

The Right Hon. J. M. Robertson says: "No historical principle is better established than this, that all historic religions run into and derive from some other religions; the creeds of all mankind being simply phases of a continuous evolution" ("Pagan Christs," 1911, p. 284).

Orthodoxy, on the other hand, looks usually for a definite cleavage—a date, in short, for the breaking away of the new from the old. Thus: "The exact date of the introduction of Christianity into Lancashire is unknown" (Fishwick, ibid., p. 17).

The Tradition of Apostolic Men in Britain.

Dean Spence (Jones), of Gloucester, in his "History for the People," alludes to the strange obstinacy of the tradition of the Church, that the faith first reached Britain at the hands of "men who came from Jerusalem or Ephesus—from men who had listened to the voice of John" ("The Church of England," 1897, Vol. I., p. 15). There is, however, no evidence to support the "strangely obstinate" tradition, and in the opinion of scholars like Haddan and Stubbs, "the statements respecting apostles or apostolic men preaching in Britain in the first century, rest upon guess, mistake, or fable" ("Councils," I., 22). The plea for British Christianity is also pronounced unhistorical. Not till the third century have we any sure ground. Then we find that Mello, a British Christian, was Bishop of Rouen, between the years 256 and 314, and that in the latter year, the Council of Arles was attended by Bishops from York, London, and Cærleon. In the year 325 the British Church assented to the conclusions of the Council of Nicæa.

* If the site is old, the name suggests a venerable antiquity. Mancenion, "the place of tents on the plain," or "the place of encampment at the beginning of the plain," i.e. a plain that, beginning here, covers a large portion of South Lancashire and the adjoining territory of Cheshire, became, under Latin influence, Mancunium or Mamucium, converted by the Saxons into Manige-ceaster, whence our present name.

The historians of Lancashire assume that they are on safe ground, therefore, in beginning their religious narrative with the martyrdom of St. Alban, in the year 304, though it be true that, not till after the year 386, do we find records of an established Christian Church in Britain, "holding the Catholic Faith and keeping up an intercourse with Rome and Palestine" (ibid., I., 10).

The Alliance with Druidism.

The "historical principle," however, to which Mr. Robertson alludes, nowhere finds a better illustration than in Britain, where Paganism and Christianity were originally linked in close organic unity. To quote Dean Spence again: "Another curious and interesting fact in connection with these early memories of the Church in Britain is its cordial alliance with the native Druidism—that strange, mystic faith with which the first missionaries must have come into daily contact. A kind of alliance seems to have existed between Christianity and Druidism; the Christian teachers evidently took possession of the holy places of the island, consecrating them to a new and better worship" (ibid., p. 15).

Mithraism.

The confusion, of which Dean Spence is only partly conscious, becomes the worse confounded when we pick up out of the historic dust of Lancashire,* Cumberland, and Yorkshire (not to mention the discoveries in other parts of the country), the evidence of the worship of Mithra in Roman Britain. The alliance of Druidism with Christianity, to which he bears witness, is not a whit more remarkable than the affinity of Mithraism to Christianity.

In the worship of Mithra, Sunday was "the Lord's Day." Christmas and Easter were occasions of high festival. The Last Supper was an honoured celebration. The Resurrection, the "Rock," the judgment of the dead, the limitation of the priesthood to one marriage, were features of the faith. In truth, the likenesses were so persistent, that the passions of Justin Martyr and Tertullian were inflamed. The religion which came out of Persia, and showed an inspiration from Mesopotamia and India, they described as the work of "wicked devils."

How great, or how slight, the hold Mithraism had attained upon the men of the higher command in Roman Lancashire, it is almost impossible for us now to hazard more than a guess, though Elton learns "from sculptured tablets, and from inscriptions and symbols on tombs, that Mithraism, at one time, prevailed extensively in this country" (Elton, ibid., p. 337).

"A Sort of Freemasonry."

The cult, however, was never destined to survive conflict with Christianity. Its esoteric character rendered it unintelligible to the masses; besides, it was, as Mr. Robertson has said, "a sort of Freemasonry," not knowing, at the moment of penning that apt description, that Renan had already so expressed himself. Freemasonry does not leave behind any open page recording numbers, progress, or influence. It is not, however, an unfair assumption from the facts before us (first), that Mithraism and Druidism left an abiding impression upon classes of the highest rank, and (second), accustomed the minds of the people to doctrines, festivals, and ritual, that were no longer novel, or remarkable, when the first recognised Christian bishops began their work in Britain.

The Recognition of Christianity.

"Christianity was not recognised as the religion of the State until the proclamation in A.D. 324, by which Constantine exhorted his subjects to follow their Emperor's example in abandoning the error of paganism; but it had been tolerated, with few intermissions, from the time when Hadrian had found a kindly excuse for the Christians by confusing them with the worshippers of his favourite Serapis" (Elton, ibid., p. 335).

The Roman Decline.

The decline of the Roman power began to be definitely experienced in Lancashire about the middle of the fourth century. The supposedly impassable barriers, erected by Agricola, Hadrian, and Severus, consisting of a ditch lying between an earthen rampart and a stone wall, and extending from sea to sea, did not stem the invading hosts of Caledonia. By A.D. 368 the Picts and Scots had reached the Metropolis.

Fresh Roman legions were sent hither, and, under Theodosius, the invaders were driven back north of the Clyde. As the country was re-conquered, fortresses on the line of march were repaired. This success afforded only temporary relief. The moment the Imperial troops slackened their grip upon the land, the Caledonians renewed their attack in force, and by the year 410, when Rome had called back all her troops, and with them the flower of native manhood enlisted under her banners, the British were at the mercy of their enemies.

The Saxon Invasion.

The Britons, in their extremity, besought the aid of certain Teutonic tribes, known to the Romans as the Jutes, the Saxons, and the Angles. The help was forthcoming, but the Britons found, all too soon, that they had but changed their conquerors. The Teutons, who spoke of themselves as Englishmen, accomplished a double task—they subdued both Briton and Caledonian. Lancashire fell into the hands of the invaders, the Angles presumably, about A.D. 488, with the seizure of the fortress at Castlefield, Manchester.

King Arthur in Lancashire.

To this conflict between the Briton and the foreign usurper belongs the gracious and winning story of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table. King Arthur is supposed to have united many British tribes, and in resisting the invaders to have fought no fewer than twelve great battles on the River Douglas, near Wigan.

Alas! the Saxon Chronicle is silent, not merely as to the King's valour in battle, but even as to his existence. What we do find, however, is the legend of a noble champion among all the peoples of the Brithonic branch of the Celtic race, extending from the Lowlands of Scotland in the north, to Brittany in the south, but most of all, among the people of Wales and Cornwall. Everywhere the god, king, knight, or champion fulfils exactly parallel functions to those of Finn and Ossian among the Goidelic, or Gaelic branch of the Celtic race inhabiting Ireland, Man, and the West Highlands of Scotland.

Myth is an Expression of Fact.

The conclusion is irresistible. Every myth is an expression of fact, the moment we possess the key to the mystery. The legend of King Arthur is not history, as we understand the term, and yet, it is a tale of historic significance, as well as an enrichment of our literature.

The Arthur of Wales had no more corporeal existence than say Cuchulainn of Ireland, or Mananan of Man. Each conception had a common genesis, the personality of the god and the abilities of the warrior being moulded, from age to age, by the habits, character, experiences, aspirations, and the configuration of the country of the people bearing the burden of the tale in their blood.

Æthelburga's Missionary Zeal.

The spoil was to the victors. In the redistribution of the land the fate of Lancashire is obscure. Some historians adduce reasons for the belief that the kingdom of Strathclyde extended southward to the Mersey, and possibly as far as the Dee. Equally sound reasons might be quoted to show that Lancashire was within the kingdom of Deira. The truth probably is that the boundaries were not very clearly defined and that even when they were known, authority weakened as it reached the limits.

There is no doubt, however, that at about the beginning of the seventh century, Lancashire was included in the kingdom of Northumbria. The fact has a special significance inasmuch as it was Æthelburga, a Queen in Northumbria, a daughter of Bertha, the spouse of Athelbert, King of Kent, who, sharing the zeal of her mother, introduced Christianity into these northern lands. A conquest was made of the King and then, the Queen's missionary efforts being sustained by the earnestness of her father-confessor, Paulinus, a follower of Augustine, the King's Council were won over. Ultimately, Northumbria became "the literary centre of the Christian world in Western Europe" (Green, "History of the English People," pp. 36-39).

Upon the success of Æthelburga's well-laid plans, conflict ensued—with the friend within, with the stranger without, and victory fell now to the pagan, now to the Christian. For years we have "only a wild story of lawlessness and bloodshed."

The Viking Invasion.

Egbert came to an arrangement with the Northumbrian nobles in 827, and this compact gave some promise of settled government. The ostensible unity of the land, from the British Channel to the Forth, into one kingdom, did not prevail, however, against the marauding expeditions of an immense fleet of sea-pirates hailing from Denmark. The object and plan of these forays bore a strong resemblance to the attacks made by the Frisians, beginning in the sixth century and extending down to the middle of the eighth century. The decline of the Frisians was apparently the signal for the rising of the Danes. Not, however, until a date later than the middle of the ninth century did the much-daring, Scandinavian sea-dogs establish, on the basis of their successes, any actual claim to the ownership of English soil.

A Viking expedition to France in 841, ravaged the valley of the Seine as far as Rouen. In 866, Charles the Bald bribed a large Danish force to leave him in peace. The adventurers sailed away, and after making "England's Nose," they determined upon another field of conquest and revenge. They established themselves in East Anglia, and next year, as soon as the conditions favoured the operations, they crossed the Humber and achieved a notable victory near the City of York, the quarrels of Ælle and Osberht as to the kingship of Northumbria making their conquest the easier. Adversity healing the differences of rival kings with no throne, the two claimants made common cause against the intruders. Their opportunity, however, had passed; the Danes under Ivarr, the Boneless, and Ubbi, held possession of the field at the end of the day.

With Northumbria in their hands, Mercia made submission. The Danes next met the forces of Edmund in East Anglia, but whether the King was slain in battle, or suffered a later martyrdom is uncertain; all the same Europe rang with the cruel infamy of Ivarr as the aggressor.

The Ransom of London.

Success followed upon the heels of success, and London was compelled to ransom itself at a price. Meanwhile, other Scandinavian forces were at work on the Western coast. From the Orkneys to Dublin Bay, "the Sea Kings" were in possession. In England, Alfred commenced his heroic struggle immediately he possessed the power (871). By "the Peace of Wedmore," Gunthrum, the King of the Danes in East Anglia, agreed to respect the boundary line of Alfred's kingdom which ran from the estuary of the Thames along the River Lea to Bedford, and thence to Stony Stratford.

We are not so closely concerned with the subsequent era of warfare. Sufficient for us is the outstanding fact that not until the male line in descent from Cnut (Old Norse, Knútr) became extinct, in 1042, was Danish rule in England ended. In the Battle of Stamford Bridge in 1066 there died the last hope of a Scandinavian kingship either in, or over, any part of England.

The Black and White Strangers in Lancashire.

For two hundred years the invaders had been a great force in the land, and it is interesting to observe how, in the passage of time, they had come to identify themselves closely with the main current of English interests. On occasion they could be more English than the English themselves. The Scandinavian kingdom of Northumbria may have extended no further south than the Wyre. All the same, South Lancashire was included in the conquest, and the only question is, whether the Viking warriors who had established their authority further south were of Norse or Danish blood—or even Icelandic, as is, sometimes, rather fancifully suggested.

Robbers All.

The old monkish chroniclers made no attempt at distinguishing between the Dane and the Norwegian. To them the invaders were, one and all, pagans and robbers; nay, worse, inasmuch as they ruthlessly destroyed every Christian emblem and institution which came their way. Now, on the other hand, the Irish annalists were clear in their definition of the two peoples. The Dane was a Dubh-Gael, that is, a dark or black stranger, or foreigner; the Norwegian a Finn-Gael, a fair or white stranger, or foreigner. Upon what was this distinction based? Not upon any ethnographical difference. Perhaps it had some reference to their armour, their equipment, the colour of the sails they bore on their ships, or to some device emblazoned thereon. Further than that we cannot go.

Following upon "the Peace of Wedmore," Northumbrian coins have come down to us bearing both inscriptions, "Elfred rex" and "Cnut rex," suggesting that the Danes recognised the over-lordship of Alfred. From the Preston hoard, however, we have other coins telling quite a different tale. These lead us to suppose that at this same period the Norsemen in the Kingdom of Dublin were successfully asserting their predominance. We cannot say, therefore, which of the two branches of the invading host was paramount in Lancashire.

The Gift of Government.

What matter? It would be easy to exaggerate the value of any distinction drawn between two peoples bearing the closest racial affinity. "Northmen" we called them all, and robbers, by the ways of the sea, they were, without exception. And yet, though they could relinquish agriculture when the sea called and a love of adventure prompted, returning, admittedly, "to piracy as a fish to the sea," we are bound to recognise, that once firmly established in the seat of authority, they displayed a gift for government of the very highest order.

The inspiration of all their acts was found in an immense wealth of religious tradition and mythical lore, all of which made for that "rude greatness of soul," of which Carlyle so ecstatically speaks ("On Heroes and Hero Worship," 1840). Daring was idolised, women were elevated to a high niche, children were brought up in ways that made for beauty and courage. If the priest fared badly at their hands, regard him for a moment from their point of view. They were not to be estranged from the ways of their fathers at the sight of a hooded figure, the sound of a bell, and the vision of a flickering taper. Land and sea and a woman's heart, afforded them the only conquests of which they knew, or cared—the scent of the soil, the swish of the sea, the secret of a sigh.

The Spiritual Compromise.

Towards the close of the Viking period, however, a compromise was becoming inevitable. The sea warriors accepted baptism, sometimes more than once, and yet they yielded not one iota of their faith in Thor. They simply showed their willingness to add one more god to their, by no means empty, Pantheon. A profession of Christianity did not alter the Viking's way of life. A bargain had been struck. Upon enlistment under the banner of a Christian king, the sign of the Cross was made over him. The process of priestly sanctification was once an offence, met by a blow, or the spilling of blood. A middle course was found; the pagan salved his conscience by expressing his determination to adhere to that God which proved himself the most powerful in battle.

War, however, has many vicissitudes, and sometimes the heads of two armies, ranged in bitter conflict, were of the same faith, though each might accuse the other. A real compromise was reached by the subtlety of Christian saints. By it the Northern pagan accepted the White Christ without any further demur, though no diminution in the status of Thor was expressed or implied thereby; the Christian accepted the pagan's Sun festivals without any weakening of grace, by virtue of the sacrifice of the Cross.

Perhaps the Christian made the better bargain. He embraced the shadow, a mere date, but rejected the substance—that for which the date stood. For instance, while his pagan neighbour was holding high festival on the anniversary of the Goddess Estre, as symbolical of the uprising of all nature at the birth of new life in spring, the Christian was celebrating the anniversary of the Resurrection of Jesus from the dead. Consciences on both sides were appeased, though perhaps none were satisfied by this cunning but transparent device. By it, however, we have a permanent memorial of the Scandinavian occupation of Britain, engrafted upon our Christian calendar.

The Northman's Code of Honour.

The Northmen had a very definite code of honour. They might pillage the homes of a people whom they had conquered and scattered, but it remained a grievous fault on the part of any man to come in secret and steal his neighbour's goods, or take his wife and children prisoners.

No warrior must show fear. He must never turn his back on an assailant of like power and like arms. He must never bind a wound till the same hour of the day next following. He must slander no man by a word he would hesitate to publish before his face. A brother's cause must be his own. Charity was a custom, rather than a virtue.

" Wapentake."

In the Isle of Man there reaches us across a period of a thousand years the flavour of a great personality, Godred Crovan, called Orry, or Gorry the King. This line of " Kings of Man and the Isles," which began in the ninth century, did not terminate till 1266. In Lancashire, the inspiration of a great hero is missing ; instead, we think we can discern, through the haze of years—is it more than a fancy ?—a government of our ancient " Hundreds," upright in character, broad in sympathy, democratic in essential spirit. The vague impression that floats down the ages, that Lancashire enjoyed, thus early in its history, a civil procedure approximating to that established under Edward III., is sustained in the fact (first) that the use of the Danish term " Wapentake," as applied to the Court of the hundred, or shire, was continued with us long after the Conquest, and (second) that the Judicature Acts of 1873-1876 left us such ancient tribunals as the Borough Court of Preston, the Court of Passage of Liverpool, and the Hundred Court of Salford. (By the same measure the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster and the Admiralty Court at Liverpool were transferred to London.)

The Court of Passage.

In estimating our indebtedness to the Scandinavian invasion, the history and constitution of the Court of Passage of Liverpool, i.e. the Court of the Passage from England to Ireland, is not unworthy of more detailed mention, inasmuch as the tribunal appears to owe its origin to a date long anterior to the grant by King John of the Charter of 1207 ; probably to the era of the Norse kingdom of Dublin. Originally the presiding justice appears to have been the elder man. At the creation of the borough, the office naturally devolved upon the Mayor for the time being. With the growth of the trade of the port with Ireland, technicalities arose touching questions of liability, navigation, etc. Two assistants were appointed to help the Mayor. Then one assessor was found sufficient and the Mayor attended only at the opening and close of a cause. Next the assessor was a lawyer and the Mayor attended only at the opening of the court each day. Before many years this perfunctory observance was limited to one attendance, viz., at the first sitting of the court in every year. And now, this shadow of the historic past has disappeared, and the lawyer-assessor is " presiding judge."

The area of jurisdiction includes the town of Liverpool (there is a slight element of doubt if it covers an extended boundary) and the limits of high water. Warrington might be included under this definition, but custom has been long satisfied with Runcorn as the boundary line inland, and the Red Stones, at Hoylake, seawards. The Lord Mayor still includes in his regalia a silver oar as one of the symbols of his office.

Our Everyday Speech Enriched.

The evidences of the Scandinavian settlement in Lancashire are to be found, also, in many of our place-names. The termination by meaning town, or village, is Danish rather than Norse. Dale meaning valley, is not so sure a guide, but bec meaning brook, fell meaning mountain, force meaning waterfall, ghyl or gill meaning glen with a stream, or tarn meaning small lake, are sure guides.

Our everyday speech would become stilted if not impossible. Prof. Allen

Mawer, M.A., in a scholarly treatise, points out: "To Scandinavian influence we owe the pronouns they, them and their, the adjectives same and both, the fro, in to and fro, and possibly the auxiliary are and the preposition till. These last are found in the Northumbrian dialect of Old English, but their widespread use is probably due to Scandinavian influence. In addition to these we may note the following:—

"Verbs: Bait, bask, batten, call, cast, dawn, droop, drown, gain, gabble, ransack, scare, scour, scrape, skim, skip, squeal, stint, take.

"Nouns: Anger, billow, boon, dusk, fellow, gait, grime, haven, husband, husk, husting, scull, scurf, skill, skin, skirt, sky, window.

"Adjectives: Awkward, ill, odd, rotten, scant, sly, ugly, weak, and a good many words in which Scandinavian forms have replaced the cognate English ones, e.g. aloft, athwart, awe, birth, egg, get, gift, give, guest, raid, sister, swain, Thursday" ("The Vikings," 1913, pp. 130-131).

Better, however, than any list of words is the first clause of the Lord's Prayer, as showing what our English tongue looked like at about the beginning of the ninth century:—

> "Fæder ure thu the eart in heofenum. Si thin nama gehalgod, to-be-come thin rice. Geweorhte thin willa on eorthan, swa swa on heofenum."

This was the precious foundation which Alfred preserved to us, and upon which Englishmen, during ten centuries, have reared so noble a structure.

The Norman Conquest.

The Norman Conquest which next followed (1066) affected Lancashire from above, rather than from below, in the ownership of the soil, the aspect of government, and the status, rather than the actual blood, of the people. Our speech was smoothed and beautified, but we showed our usual eagerness for the short cut, by snapping up a number of dialect words. The higher ranks of our Norman conquerors had preserved, like a legacy of Denmark, their home land, these appellatives, of which abet, baggage, elope, equip, jolly, rubbish, scoop, and strife are examples of present-day utility.

No "Lancashire" in Domesday.

The name Lancashire does not appear in the Domesday Survey; the land south of the Ribble was included in the County of Chester, while all north of that dividing line was linked up with Cumberland, Westmorland, and Yorkshire.

The Palatine Earldom of Chester was one of the four great creations of William on the frontiers. Cheshire included not only the large and important slice of the lands north of the Mersey, which we now denominate "Industrial Lancashire," but, in addition, the lower parts of Flint and Denbigh, as far as the Conway River. Cheshire, indeed, was like a little kingdom, both in area and government. It had its own Courts and its own Parliament. Writs ran in the name of the Earl, and offences were against the peace of the Earl, not of the King. Not till three centuries later did Lancashire attain anything approaching like government. By this time the privileges of Chester were largely merged in the Crown.

The Birth of the County.

At the time of the great survey, Roger de Poictu had lost his lands to the King. In subsequent years, however, he not only regained his lands, but succeeded in adding to them so substantially, that for a certain period he owned all that we now know as Lancashire. In 1102 he forfeited his possessions to Henry I. Sixteen years later the King created the honour of Lancaster and, adding escheated manors in Nottingham, Derby, and Lincoln thereto, together with certain royal manors, conferred the dignity upon his nephew Stephen.

The natural geographical division of Lancashire obtrudes itself in nearly all these transactions. David, King of the Scots, received Cumberland, most of Westmorland, the whole of Furness, and possibly all Lancashire north of the Ribble ; the Earl of Chester attaining to all south of that line.

The Earldom of Lancaster.

Henry II. next gave the honour to William, but it was once more in the King's hands from 1164 till 1189, when Richard I. made gift to his brother John. On John's rebellion, five years later, the Crown again took possession, and the honour so remained till 1267. The crown demesne, south of the Ribble, was vested in the Earl of Chester from 1229 till 1232. On the death of the Earl, it passed to William Ferrers, Earl of Derby, in right of his wife Agnes, but on the Earl's rebellion, Henry III. created his son Edmund, Earl of Lancaster (1267).

By the marriage of Thomas, the second Earl, with Alice, the heiress of Henry de Lacy, the Earldom of Lincoln became merged in the greater house of Lancaster, and with it all the rich lands of the Lacy family in Lancashire.

The First Duke of Lancaster.

Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, was executed for treason at Pontefract (1322). He was succeeded by his brother Henry, whose son Henry (called Wryneck) became, in acknowledgment of his great military services, the first Duke of Lancaster (1351).

Blanche, the daughter of the first Duke, married on the 19th of May, 1359, her cousin, John of Gaunt, the fourth son of Edward III. There was an elder daughter of " the good Duke of Lancaster." She married the Duke of Bavaria. Upon the death of the Duchess, John of Gaunt came into possession of the united estates of his father-in-law, and in the right of his wife he became Earl of Lancaster (1361). In the succeeding year the King celebrated his fiftieth birthday. He marked the event by advancing John to the dignity of Duke of Lancaster (1362). Lionel, the King's third son and John's elder brother, was made Duke of Clarence. Thus was established the rival houses of Lancaster and York, out of which ultimately arose contending claimants to the throne.

The son of the union of Blanche, daughter of the first Duke, with John of Gaunt, was Henry of Bolingbroke. His first marriage was with Mary, one of the co-heiresses of the de Bohuns of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton. Upon the accession of Henry IV., the estates of the Duke of Lancaster became the possession of the king, but were to be held as a separate inheritance and were not to be merged in the possessions of the Crown. Edward IV. made this final and absolute by an Act of 1461.

The Rise of the Towns.

The ebb and flow of the fortune of the governing caste have a very direct bearing upon this slender ethnological study. The dates next following bear witness. The rise of the towns dates from the close of the twelfth century. Cartmel is believed to have had its market under Henry II. Preston was probably a free borough some years before King John made his grant to Lancaster in 1199. Thereafter followed : Liverpool,* 1207 ; Salford, 1230 ;

* Lyrpole, Lirpoole, Lyverpole, Litherpoole, Leorpool, Lerpoole, Leverpole, and Leverpoole. Many explanations are given of the origin and meaning : from *liver*wort, or seaweed, a hepatic drug ; from liver, a bird that is supposed to have frequented the " pool," which extended, at one time, from the foot of Shaws Brow or William Brown

Wigan, 1246 ; Manchester, 1301. Further charters were granted by Henry III. to Preston and Liverpool in 1227.

Origin of the Palatinate.

The tradition of courts before the Conquest has been alluded to. Edward III. either transformed these traditions into a vivid reality, or made an entirely new precedent, when, in 1351, the Duke of Lancaster received power to issue writs under his own seal and the office of Chancellor was called into being. The Palatinate was originally for the period of his son John of Gaunt's life (1377). These privileges were next extended and settled in perpetuity on the Dukes of Lancaster (1396). The Chancery dates from 1376 (or earlier), the Duchy court from 1407, each with its own seal. The Chancery of the Duchy, in which is vested all matters touching the revenue and dignities of the Duchy, has fallen into desuetude, and is now practically obsolete.

The Black Death.

The development of the county has encountered many a serious set-back. The persistent warfare between England and Scotland, which began under Street, by way of Whitechapel, Paradise Street, and the Custom House to the river; from Litherpoole, meaning lower-pool as Litherland means lower-land. Two of these definitions do not embrace the tradition of the bird, and the definition which does so has resort to a species that is extinct. In fact, we can find no trace that any such bird ever did exist. I revert, therefore, to the accent, sound, and spelling for the key, to custom for confirmation.

In Liverpool all pepper-corn rents due to the Corporation, are payable on the Festival of St. John. The name John was given to the Baptist in accordance with Divine direction ; it was probably assumed by the Evangelist, in lieu of his birth name, as a token of his sacred call. The rule of taking a name is part of the ritual of Christian baptism, and the custom also flourishes amongst the adherents of Mohammed.

"The word John combines the idea of the sun, of the dove, and the tenderness of a loving mother" (Inman, "Ancient Faiths," Vol. I., pp. 26-30).

In art, the Evangelist is represented in lines of beauty, usually with little or no trace of a beard, always in association with a bird, presumably a dove. Many painters have portrayed him as the favoured apostle, resting his head on the shoulder of the Master. In old age the Evangelist bears a beard, and the bird is an eagle (see Revelation iv. 7 ; also Dr. Budge, "The Gods of the Egyptians" Vol. I., p. 5). Confusion between the Baptist and the Evangelist, by reason of the significance of their common name, seems to have been inevitable. For instance, the Evangelist was given the appellation of "Divine," inasmuch as he was cherished above all other apostles, yet, to the Baptist was given the Midsummer Festival, June 24th, the most important date of the pagan calendar, next after December 25th, the first day of the New Year.

Throughout Europe we have the old pagan legend of a great King bemoaning the fate of his four children, who, under the spell of enchantment, are required to pass centuries in the form of swans. Grimm recounts a Teutonic version ; it is a treasured feature of Irish mythology. The symbolism to the Sun and the four quarters of the year is sufficiently obvious.

In Lancashire, the Druids made us familiar with the festival of the King of the Heavens, and celebrated it on June 24th, or July 5th, by the present calendar (see Hone's "Every Day Book"). Celtic mythology told us the legend of Lyr (Lir, or Ler—Lear is the Shakesperian spelling), the Ocean God, whose four daughters (or three daughters and one son, i.e. "Mananan mac y Lyr" according to another version of the same tale) were required by a stepmother to bathe in a pool, whereupon she struck the water with a rod of enchantment, and, lo! the children of the King were all swans. The old superstition against killing a swan (lest it should incorporate the living presence of Fionnula, Aodh, Fiacra, or Conn) is recognised throughout Europe to this day. The name Lyr-pool may sustain, therefore, one of the oldest traditions in the world. The eagle and the dove, seem to have been combined to represent either equally, while the sprig of clover borne in the bill, may be no more than a comparatively recent borrowing from the incident of Noah and the Ark. All the evidence points in one direction and, it is not without significance, that the church which stood on the high ground at the head of the "Pool," was dedicated to St. John (see paragraphs headed "Robbers All," "Wapentake," and "The Court of Passage" ; also Elton's "Origins," p. 279 ; D'Arbois de Jubainville's "Irish Mythological Cycle", Dr. Douglas Hyde's "Story of Early Gaelic Literature" ; Standish O'Grady's "History," p. 109, etc. Further, before the church was built in 1783, the site was a great holiday or fair ground, often called "The Great Heath."

Edward I. in 1296, and continued through a considerable portion of the succeeding century, is a page of general history. The tax upon the manhood of the country, particularly of the northern counties, was nowhere more seriously felt than in Lancashire. The Black Death, particularly the pestilence of 1349-1350, completed the desolation of the country-side.

Edward III. and France.

The Crusades, too, were responsible for an ingathering of men from Lancashire. Many men, also, fell in the conflict which ensued upon the claim of Edward III. to the French throne. There was, however, another side to the picture of loss.

The Flemish Invasion.

A peaceful invasion of Lancashire is attributed to the reign of Edward III. If the invasion took place, probably no one, the far-sighted King included, was gifted with such prevision as to foresee its ultimate importance ; if it did not take place, not only is a pretty story lost to us, but the historian is hard pressed to find an answer to that question with which I began—" Why is so large a share of England's industrial activities centred in Lancashire ? "

Curiously enough, the reputed invaders were again Celts—descendants of like blood to those Belgic tribes that invaded Britain before the present era. No armed host ever accomplished half so much. This is the story :—

Naboth's Vineyard.

Beginning about the tenth century, successive Counts of Flanders had promoted both religion and trade among their people, and the country was now gathering a rich harvest from the field of their rulers' discriminating sowing. Ghent, Arras, Courtrai, Rousselaere, Valenciennes, Cassel, Tournai, Lille, St. Omer, Ypres, and Bruges were the centre of the wool-weaving and fulling industry of Europe.

Under Baldwin's daughters, Johanna (1206-1243), Margaret (1243-1278), and the latter's son, Guy of Dampiere (1278-1305), not fewer than 40,000 looms for weaving cloth could be counted in one city. Guy spent a considerable portion of his life as a prisoner in France. The feud was old standing. The territory in dispute formed a rich prize. As Flanders advanced in prosperity, successive Kings of France pushed their claims with greater urgency. Ultimately the cities broke into open revolt, and in 1336, Jacob Van Artevelde, a high-born brewer of Ghent, interpreting the will of his fellow-countrymen, became the great national leader and hero. He concluded a treaty with Edward III. of England, and to the alliance thus formed is traced a substantial factor in the fortunes of Lancashire.

Thomas Fuller, the divine, historian and wit, vivifies for us this page of our history. Writing four hundred years after the event, he tells us that Edward III. sent an invitation to certain disaffected Flemings to come over to England. The King was fishing in troubled waters, but how shrewdly he baited his hook is best shown in Fuller's quaint and homely directness of address.

Baiting the Hook.

The Flemings were told that they would " feed on fat beef and mutton, till nothing but their fulness should stint their stomachs ; their beds should be good, and their bed-fellows better, seeing the richest yeomen in England would not disdain to marry their daughters to them, and such was the beauty of the English maidens that the most envious foreigners could not but commend them."

Surely the love and noble endeavour of Cuchulainn, the Irish Achilles, were not more cunningly sought by Fand when she, " the Pearl of Beauty," lured the champion out of Ireland into the Shining Land, there to take up her just cause against the so-called Three Kings of Evil, in return " for her love, silver and gold, and an abundance of wine to drink."

Where Cuchulainn was a victim, the young and ardent Fleming could not be insensible to temptation. Is it a matter for any wonder, then, that we have the persistent legend of a Flemish colony settled on the banks of the Irwell, and that in succeeding years the weavers, fullers, and dyers mating with Lancashire women spread themselves up the valleys north, west, and east?

The King's Fostering Hand.

The King was as good as his word to one John Kempe, in 1331, and his royal will was expressed in the Act of 1337. He fostered the industry, and wool became the foundation of a great and ever-growing trade in many parts of the country. The Woolsack in the House of Lords is a persistent reminder of an unquestioned fact. That progress was made, may be inferred from an Act of the succeeding reign—that of Richard II. The eighteen Commissioners, to whom the powers of Parliament were now delegated, voted the subsidy on wool, woolfells, and leather to the King for life (" Rolls of Parliament," Vol. III., p. 368).

Whether the invaders were few or many, it would certainly appear that the Flemish wool weavers did not merely establish in England an old trade on new lines (a trade which still remains one of high importance to Lancashire and to the counties touching her south-eastern border), but seem to have called into being a population skilled in the manufacture, as well as the use, of tools and machinery (now another of the staple industries of Lancashire), besides a large body of people ready to hand when, in a later century, cotton cloth became an article of world-wide, commercial utility.

The Grounds for Doubt.

When doubt is cast upon the ancient legend, because " the trade of these districts did not at, or soon after, this time rapidly develop, neither is there any marked influx of foreign names such as would naturally have followed such an invasion," I am disposed to examine, with some little misgiving, the grounds upon which the ancient legend is so curtly dismissed.

To look for Flemish names in our current directories, after a lapse of nearly six hundred years, is to search for a needle in a haystack ; nay, worse, to turn a blind eye on the changes inevitably wrought in almost all foreign names.

It is the testimony of everyone bearing a surname, foreign in origin, singular in spelling, or awkward in pronunciation, that it is nearly impossible to preserve against the attack of all, and sundry, the merest resemblance of the ancient sound, or spelling. As an intensely practical people we cut down all impediments to our easy progress, and only where a family has a very definite link with land ownership, is the old form of spelling preserved. The doubting Thomas ignores, too, the vicissitudes of fortune of which the male line of every notable family in Lancashire, living or defunct, is a witness.

A Parallel.

When I look elsewhere, all I can find is at best a shadowy outline. Wiltshire, for instance, by reason of its Downs, was, from time immemorial, a great sheep-rearing county, but Calne, as the centre of the clothiers' trade (long since extinct), dates its era of prosperity from the days of Edward III. and the arrival of the Flemings. Yet all that now sustains the foreign link is found in the place name of " Flanders," which forms part of a farm on the north of the town and a tithing in Hilmarton, called " New Zealand " !

Yet here is preserved an abundance of native records. Calne was a place of consequence before the present bacon-curing business was ever thought of. It returned two representatives to Parliament as far back as 1295, and continued to do so up to 1832, when Manchester had none. Thomas Babington Macaulay was one of the last pair. Fifteen burgesses in Calne, of whom the Baily family alone numbered eleven, and therefore sufficiently strong to intimidate Lord Lansdowne in the choice of his nominees, were of greater power in the councils of the state than many a hundred thousand people in Lancashire (A. E. W. Marsh, " A History of the Borough and Town of Calne," 1903, p. 120).

The Ghosts of Ardent Lovers.

All that the archives of the ancient borough provide us with, however, are a tiny group of family names—Brabant, Goddard, Maslin, Jordan (Jourdiane ?) and Parfitt—mere ghosts (and doubtful ones at that) of that group of Flemish weavers and ardent lovers who came to England in the fourteenth century, thinking, probably, only of their stomachs, their beds, and those English maidens " that the envious foreigners could not but commend," and nothing at all of that skill in trade which they bore in their hands. Yet that skill was more precious to us than sacks full of rubies.

There is one further point—the Lancashire clog is common to all factory workers. From whence came it, if not from the sabots of Flanders ?

Lastly, remembering what Caxton accomplished practically single-handed in the art of printing, the use of movable types and the wooden press, which he set up at Westminster in 1476, directly as a result of his apprenticeship in Flanders, what might not a mere handful of men, say half a dozen, accomplish in Lancashire ?

Until, therefore, the old legend has been scattered to the four winds of heaven for better reasons than any of those I have hitherto encountered, and to which generations of historians have lent their countenance, I hesitate to repudiate the pretty tale to which Fuller has imparted so human a touch.

The Wars of the Roses.

The conflict between the House of Lancaster (Red Rose) and the House of York (White Rose), which began with the battle of St. Albans, on the 23rd May, 1455, and ended with the battle of Bosworth Field, on the 22nd August, 1485, was responsible for a great drain upon the manhood of Lancashire, though none of the battles were fought within the boundaries of the county.

Boy and Girl Marriages.

Under the Tudors, Lancashire made considerable advances. County families began to arise. There was a widespread desire to own land, to add field to field, and to entrench a family in the soil by a marriage that was a linking-up of broad acres, rather than a union born of affection and regard. In this way, children of tender years were sealed in matrimony at an age when " the husband " was a mere boy attending school, and " the wife " a girl no more than seven years of age.

Many well-known halls belong to this period, among which may be named : Speke, Ordsall, Little Mitton, Ince, Cleworth, Smithells, Lostock, Lydiate, Rufford, Belfield, Rawcliffe, Rossall (Grange), etc.

The Lancashire Witches.

In a spirit of admiration, a man may call the woman of his heart, " a Lancashire witch," and she hears the term with ill-concealed delight—granted that he is the man of her choice. Other days, other ways. In the seventeenth century no more damning accusation could have passed any man's lips. Torture and death fell in the wake of the terrible words.

To-day we stand humbled and amazed that our common sense did not rise up in revolt, but, alas! our whole history is soured by episodes, belonging particularly to the years 1612 and 1634, that touch our pride to the quick; in truth, they put our humanity to shame. Every encyclopædia makes record of our folly; the article "Witchcraft," in "Chambers's Encyclopædia," is particularly good, but those readers who desire a fuller narrative of the subject as a whole, cannot do better than turn to Mrs. Lynn Linton's handy volume, "Witch Stories," in the Mayfair Library.

"Superstition dies hard," writes the gifted lady in a vein of profound sadness, "or rather so far as we have yet gone, it does not die at all," and she proceeds to assail us because superstition, ignorance, and credulity are as strong with us as ever.

All that we in Lancashire can plead against our twentieth-century accusers is (first) our remorse, (second) in England, elsewhere, witchfinding ran to greater lengths of obscene and merciless cruelty, and (third) that on the Continent, hundreds of thousands of women and little children were massacred to vindicate the honour and glory of God, while we were satisfied with no more than a dozen, hapless, old women at a time—poor creatures, who should have evoked our charity, rather than our unreasoning vengeance.

Voices in Protest.

Voices were heard in protest, but they fell on deaf ears. Reginald Scot's efforts are remembered chiefly because they met with a kingly rebuke in 1597. In the succeeding century two Chief Justices—North (1637-1685) and Holt (1642-1710)—courageously stemmed the outcry. The last trial for witchcraft in England was in 1712.

But, so late as 1768, we find John Wesley vehemently decrying men who regarded all accounts of witches and apparitions "as mere old wives' fables." He enters his "solemn protest" to an outcry that is "in direct opposition to the Bible," and, as though hungering after the old scenes of bloodshed, the divine concludes "that the giving up witchcraft is in effect giving up the Bible."

Wesley had in mind, apparently, those passages which exalt celibacy and debase marriage, viz., Genesis vi. 2; 1 Corinthians vii. 8, to which must be added the injunction against suffering a witch to live (Exodus xxii. 18). Here was Wesley's proof that witchcraft could be, and that the woman who practised it should die.

How it Began.

Monachism is an inversion of nature. To the disordered imagination of a monk, or a Churchman seeking the "higher" life, a woman, particularly a beautiful woman, is the natural depositary of the Devil on earth. A pretty, innocent, little girl was, I take it, the abode of a little Devil, or a Devil in miniature, or in process of growth.

"The Paradise, or Garden of the Holy Fathers" (of which Dr. Wallis Budge, the Keeper of the Assyrian and Egyptian Antiquities at the British Museum, has given us a complete translation of the Syriac text of Athanasius, Archbishop of Alexandria; Palladius, Bishop of Helenopolis; St. Jerome, and others) (London, two vols., 1907), is one long advocacy of the single state, as it flourished with "holy men" in the desert, amid vermin, filth, dirt, and rags. The comparison picture in modern life, and under a regular ecclesiastical system, is to be found in Dr. Henry Lea's "History of Sacerdotal Celibacy in the Christian Church" (London: Revised Edition, two vols., 1907), one of the very best books that America has thus far produced.

Reading these in the light of the texts above quoted, we are bound to realise that Wesley had both logic and consistency on his side; of sense and humanity not one tiny scrap.

Next, let us remember that the old women fared badly at the hands of the so-called "saints" and "divines," because in disposing of charms to heal sick cows, incantations to bring people "out of life," and all the rest of the ridiculous, superstitious nonsense, they were standing against an immensely powerful priesthood, jealous of intrusion upon what they regarded as their exclusive domain—the right either of controlling, or interceding, with the powers of the unseen world.

In a word, I cannot think of any fact in extenuation of our offence but one—abysmal ignorance of which fanatical superstition was a natural corollary.

Slowly Evolving Prosperity.

The humble position occupied by Lancashire, in the eyes of the State in the seventeenth century, is indicated in the assessment of the county, for the ship-money of Charles I.

In 1636, the total imposition was one ship of 400 tons burthen, 160 men, and £1,000. The relative importance of the towns is shown in the division of the tax. The contribution of Wigan was set down at £50, Preston £40, Lancaster £30, Liverpool £25, Clitheroe £7 10s. Leeds was assessed at £200, and Hull at £140.

The Civil War.

In the Civil War, which began, in Lancashire, with a Royalist attack upon Manchester, on Sunday, September 25th, 1642, the Parliament found its greatest support in the manufacturing towns; the King, his adherents among the older class of landed gentry, and in centres coming under the influence of the old ecclesiastical settlements, the success of Charles giving the Catholics hope of a speedy relief from the laws of Archbishop Parker and the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Preston, Bolton, Hoghton, Wigan, Blackburn, Lancaster, Lathom, Liverpool, and Warrington figured largely in the bitter conflict, and there was much loss of blood, particularly at the taking of Bolton, where Prince Rupert gave the order of "no quarter." One account accuses the Cavaliers of "having killed, stripped, and spoiled" all the people they met with, regarding "neither the dolefull cries of the women nor children," and also of having brought out "some husbands on purpose to be slaine before their wives' faces." Not fewer than 1,500 lives were sacrificed.

Manchester, however, never ceased to be the head-quarters of the Parliament in Lancashire, and when Bolton suffered such cruel losses, Manchester lent the hand of succour to the families of those who had fallen in the people's cause.

Waterways and Railways.

The eighteenth century has left its mark on the face of Lancashire, in the canal, which the Duke of Bridgewater constructed, from Worsley to Salford, and Manchester, crossing the Irwell at Barton.

The first railway was between Manchester and Liverpool. A landmark in national history was marred by the death of Wm. Huskisson, the statesman, from injuries sustained at the inauguration of the new iron roadway, on September 15th, 1830.

Huskisson was one of the pioneers of Free Trade. By his policy, trade with the Colonies expanded, import duties were reduced, and the navigation laws relaxed. Lancashire has good reason to hold his memory in high esteem.

The Primary Trade.

If we would seek an origin to the rise of Lancashire, we must investigate other forms of industry than the manufacture of cotton. We must trace a piece of cloth wholly fabricated of cotton yarn, as we would organic life—through forms to which present-day manifestations reveal no clear line of historic development.

Wool was the primary trade. In 1127 a group of Benedictine monks established a house a couple of miles from Barrow-in-Furness. They erected an Abbey, which is one of the finest examples of the transition Norman and English architecture in the kingdom. They remunerated their servitors by the proceeds of farming sheep on the surrounding hills.

The Cistercians succeeded the Benedictines. Down to the Reformation, the Abbot of Furness, as the owner of many acres and the director of a great industry, enjoyed princely wealth. He held choice lands, too, across the water, in the Isle of Man; and whilst mining for silver and lead flourished, he had a finger in every pie.

Except for certain coarse fabrics, which were still woven at home, the wool of sheep feeding on the English hillside was not worked up in England; it was exported to the country of another Furnes, a town in West Flanders. Edward III. altered all this, under the circumstances already detailed.

By the middle of the sixteenth century there was a flourishing trade in worsted goods. And by the eighteenth century we had in our midst a class of clothiers (i.e. makers of cloth, not clothes) who kept their own sheep.

Cotton.

Cotton was familiar to the ancients. Mention of it is made in the annals of Egypt. Fabrics of cotton were worn in China before the Christian era.

Cotton was imported into England as early as the thirteenth century, being then used for candle wicks and for admixture with flax or wool. In Lancashire it was applied to the manufacture of fustians, vermilions, and dimities, as early as 1641. The industry received its first impetus in 1733, when John Kay invented the fly shuttle. James Hargreaves followed with his spinning "Jenny"* in 1764, Richard Arkwright with his water-frame (spinning by rollers) in 1769, and Samuel Crompton with his mule† in 1779. The savage hostility which these men encountered, by reason of their inventions, makes sorry reading for us to-day.

The first piece of calico, i.e. a fabric all cotton, was not produced till 1783; cotton yarn being hitherto used for weft only, the warp being of flax or wool. Machines were worked by water power. Many mills, of old standing, are still found in dales with verdure clad. Beauty seems loath to go. Steam was first applied in 1789.

Thereafter, progress was along two lines of development—an augmentation of output and a reduction in the cost of production. In 1800 a yard of calico was worth as many shillings as it was worth in pence in 1900, an enormous growth of national wealth notwithstanding.

Calico Printing.

Calico printing was first practised in England by French refugees, living

* "Jenny," supposedly, for ginny from gin, short for engine. The term, however, was one of anger and contempt, and as the people believed that the machine was the instrument of the Devil, inasmuch as it would throw them out of work, probability points to "Jenny" for Jean, a name typical of all Scotswomen. At Edinburgh, Jean Weir was hanged in 1670 for employing the Devil to spin her lint, and at Paisley seven women suffered martyrdom for bewitching Christian Shaw, who later was the means of starting the thread industry. Many other interpretations are offered.

† So called because the "mule" combined the characteristics of both the preceding inventions.

on the banks of the Thames, exiled by the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The grandfather of the great Sir Robert Peel introduced the process into Lancashire; "Parsley Peel" (from the parsley-leaf which formed a feature of the first design) established thereby the fortunes of his house.

The Supply.

Columbus tells us in the journal of his first voyage to the New World how he found cotton growing all over the West Indies. In 1790 these islands produced the great proportion of our supply. A hundred years later the Southern States of America provided the bulk, while the exports from the West Indies amounted to no more than a few hundred bales all told.

The British Cotton Growing Association, headed first by the late Sir Alfred Jones, and now by Mr. J. A. Hutton, is engaged in a work of national importance—promoting the growth of cotton within the Empire, i.e. in India, Cyprus, Egypt, Uganda, West Africa, the West Indies, and elsewhere, in order that the mills of Lancashire may be, in the first place, independent of the market-rigging of America, and, in the second place, sufficiently supplied with cotton of improved quality.*

The Lightning Advance.

The great rise of industrial Lancashire is essentially a fact of recent history. In 1801 the population was only 673,486, equal, say, to one person to every two acres of the total area. The nineteenth century, therefore, saw the greatest of all invasions in our long history.

The period of the Crimean War, which dates from 1854, was perhaps responsible for the most conspicuous accession to the population of the chief towns. The "wooden walls of England" were not, as yet, a mere figure of speech; on the Mersey there were three jobs for every man who was a wood-worker. In the stress of the conflict, carpenters could easily earn £1 per day. On this high pay (far surpassed in certain skilled trades in Sheffield to-day), a carpenter often felt justified in requiring a cab to fetch him to his work.

Such abounding prosperity as Liverpool and Manchester enjoyed in these years read like a tale from a fairy-book, to poor tillers of the soil and mechanics in country towns, earning a mere £1 per week. Labour was attracted from all quarters—from Wales, Scotland, Ireland, and even the little Isle of Man.

The Housing Problem.

The result was inevitable; there were soon more people than there was accommodation. No satisfactory measures were adopted for grappling with the problem. Entire areas became insanitary by overcrowding. Ultimately, when disease and death descended upon a locality, and the health of the entire community was endangered, authorities were moved to action. It was then realised that in temporising, an expense was incurred greater than would be sufficient to rid a locality of the evil altogether, viz., by buying up an insanitary area, levelling the old-fashioned tenements with the ground, and erecting upon the site thus cleared dwellings assured of a sufficiency of light and fresh air, wherein the people could live clean and decent lives.

* India is producing at the present time from 300,000 to 500,000 bales per annum of the inch staple variety for use in her own mills, the market for the cloth being found in her own land, Japan, and elsewhere. What Lancashire wants is the staple first of all, and after that a substantial addition to her supply of fine cotton. For this last she has a steadily increasing demand. India can meet this demand for an improved quality and the Punjab Government is willing to co-operate. Here is Lancashire's opportunity. What is it that stops the way?

Peabody Dwellings.

The fame of George Peabody, that "brave, honest, and noble-hearted friend of mankind," as Winthrop, the orator, called him, was about this time on everybody's tongue. But even a generous and far-sighted American millionaire, having at call all the financial skill that was his own, and all the technical advice of the best builders and most capable architects of both England and the United States, did not find any real solution of the problem.

The Peabody dwellings for the people are familiar to every Londoner. They are an adaptation of an idea familiar to Scotland (Dundee in particular) for generations—an immense aggregation of independent flats, each containing two, three, or more apartments, approached by a common stairway from the street level.

Before the era of motor omnibuses, electric trams, and railways, buildings of this character were inevitable in London. Despite the high value of land, a workman must be near his work, and "nearness" is calculated on the basis of time, not the distance covered. In the Provinces, the difficulty of a prohibitive site value, did not operate with anything approaching like force. Nevertheless, in Liverpool the Corporation began by applying the same remedy.

Insanitary dwellings were destroyed, as accommodation was provided elsewhere for the inhabitants. Thus far, the authorities brought to their task no more knowledge of the instincts of working people, than might have been expected from earthly humans engaged in preparing homes for hypothetical inhabitants of the moon. The buildings which they erected, at the north and south ends of the town, were hardly better than a cross between Kirkdale Jail and Brownlow Hill Workhouse Infirmary.*

Liverpool Streets "Paved with Gold."

Shortly before 1860 a poor Welshman arrived in Liverpool. His name was Owen Elias. As the perfidious Spaniard was attracted to Cuzco, the "Holy City" of the Empire of the Incas, in Peru, by a tale of streets literally paved with gold, so was the Welshman lured to Liverpool.

He succeeded in getting a job with the Corporation, and ultimately was attached to a gang of pavers. Handling stone sets and bent over his work all day, I do not fancy that Owen Elias was long in penetrating the illusion as to the precise character of the metal with which the streets of Liverpool were paved.

Never at any period of his life could he speak English with fluency, or even with schoolboy accuracy. In these first years of residence in Lancashire, he spoke English so badly, and Welsh so well, that he was jeered at, or "jerried" without mercy.

"Aye! Aye! Don't come down this ladder because I have took it away," is a sentence attributed to him, but it may be apocryphal, but not "When did he went?" or "Did you told him?"

Elias's disabilities of speech made him a listener, rarely a speaker. Herein, lay the foundation of a considerable fortune. On every hand he heard the working-man "grousing."

"Why is it," asked the men of Elias's gang, "that there are no small houses for labouring men?"

Even the newspapers touched on the question, but this was when an outbreak of fever had afflicted everybody with a sense of danger. Fifty years ago many newspapers showed grave hesitation in discussing any social question that had not been first ventilated in a police court, board room, or public meeting.

* Liverpool, however, has made—and is still making—a splendid atonement for the lack of imagination originally brought to the solution of the problem. I gladly bear witness to the fact that nowhere in this kingdom has more money, deeper practical sympathy, and a higher grade of skill been brought to the task. The volumes entitled, "Report of the Housing Committee," 1912 and 1914, recording the work done in recent years under Col. G. Kyffin-Taylor, Alderman Austin Harford, and Mr. Fletcher T. Turton, Director of Housing, are a revelation.

The Welshman's Solution.

Elias grasped three plain facts:—(1) that the working-man wished to live "in a house," not a section of a jail-workhouse-infirmary kind of place; (2) that the working-man's wife, who usually came from the country (where basements were unknown), was not content to spend her long, busy, and lonely day in a kitchen below ground; and (3) that 3s. 6d. per week was an outside figure for rent. The solution of the problem became almost self-evident, the moment this pavier had got these simple facts clearly established in his mind.

The chapel is supposed to be to the Welshman what the Temple is reputed to be to the Freemason. Owen Elias had the luck to fall in with a fellow countryman named Roberts, the grandfather of the present Sir John Herbert Roberts, M.P. Roberts undertook to smooth away obvious difficulties and to provide timber and building material. Land was found—an arrangement with a landowner is not, as a rule, difficult when you propose to deposit a good deal of value on his property—and the first pair of houses were soon in process of construction.

Each house consisted of a living-room or kitchen, a scullery, two bedrooms above, a front door on the level of the street, and a yard behind, all for 3s. 6d. per week. That first front door was not swinging on its hinges before the tenant was in, while other would-be tenants were daily clamouring for the right of entry to No. 3, and so on right up the pegged-out street.

Good Work at a Discount.

Owen Elias besought assistance from the home country. Any Welshman, particularly any Carnarvonshire man, who could clap one brick upon another, or who could, in the alternative, strike a nail on the head with a hammer, was sure of a job. But Owen Elias did not make forfeit on the score of nationality. He showed his worldly wisdom by a sound grasp of small economies.

To the newcomer of his own tongue and faith, Elias provided the site, the materials for construction, and the money to live on until such time as the premises were completed. Thus, every man worked under the conviction that he was his own employer, and, as his reward was based on work done, he toiled every hour of daylight, from sunrise to dusk, he could spare from his bed.

The need of more, and still more houses was urgent. The tenant, with his bride and a gathering of furniture, was, seemingly, waiting at every door. Good work was at a discount for two reasons: (1) because the rent which the tenant could pay was strictly limited by the wages of his grade or class; (2) because the land was held on a lease, and site and building must revert to the owner of the soil in, say, seventy-five years.

No wonder, then, that every labour-saving device was adopted in construction. Outside walls were nine inches thick, inside walls were sometimes half a brick (4½ inches), more often they were of stiles, lath and plaster, 3½ inches from side to side. The term "jerry" was acquiring a fresh significance.

The Corporation insisted upon the submission of properly prepared plans. Among the recruits, in this emergency, was one Richard Owen, a Welshman, with some knowledge of drawing. Richard Owen brought in a relative of my own. A bargain was struck between architect and builder, by which Owen Elias agreed to discharge Richard Owen's architectural fees for a lump sum—2s. 6d. per house!

I leave the reader to guess which of the trio found the names for the new streets that were coming up like mushrooms. We have, in a bunch, names from Dickens:—Pickwick Street, Dombey Street, Dorrit Street, Weller Street, etc. Great names in modern literature are over the way: Thackeray Street, Tennyson Street, and Arnold Street, the latter for Matthew Arnold (for his glowing tribute to Wales in his "Study of Celtic Literature," at that time fresh in the public mind, from its appearance in a monthly review), not the father, Dr. Arnold, of Rugby. But as a rule, the never-ceasing call for new names for new streets was met by reference to the newspapers from day to day.

Prohibition Areas.

Owen Elias and his associates encircled the entire town, practically creating the districts now known as Kirkdale, Walton, Everton, Cabbage Hall, West Derby, and Toxteth Park.* They were responsible, also, for one noteworthy innovation. Finding that the Justices granted licences to the newly formed districts, and that the presence of a public-house at a street corner lowered the status of the whole neighbourhood, absorbing into itself the values torn from the surrounding property, the Welsh builders disposed of the menace, by introducing a new condition into their terms of sale. If the prohibition were dictated entirely by business considerations, it proved to be based in sound wisdom; if it were prompted by reasons of conscience, it proved as beneficial in operation as it was good in motive.

The Greatest Invasion of all History.

I have dealt with so much detail upon this development of Liverpool, not by warrant of its vast concern to one locality, but (1) because it is typical of a movement which, starting in all the big towns about 1869, had attained the proportions of a revolution by 1872—the boom year, following the close of the Franco-Prussian War. (2) Because the accession of population, of which this vast array of new dwellings was a witness, represents an invasion of Lancashire beside which that of Agricola pales in memory, while the Viking occupation seems no more than a tale from a book.

Where did the People come from?

Where did all these people come from? If for answer we turn to the directories of Liverpool and Manchester, and endeavour to pick up the clue of origin by mere name, we are not long left in much doubt.

Wales makes an amazing showing. Between eighty and one hundred names appear in a column of the Liverpool Directory. No fewer than forty-seven columns are required to chronicle the whereabouts of the Jones family, a total of 4,230 separate households. (Not all are Welsh so far as living memory goes; the exceptions, however, are negligible.) The voting register contained at one time nearly five hundred entries of "John Jones." To establish a separate identity for each, as a protection against impersonation, was beyond the wit of all the registration agents of Lancashire combined, and the task was given up in despair.

Other names common to Wales are as follows: Williams, 2,430 entries; Roberts, 1,800; Hughes, 1,530. Oft-repeated English names make only a moderate showing by comparison (taking into account the greater English population) : Smith, 2,070 ; Brown, 1,000 ; Robinson, 720 ; Wood, 450 ; Richardson, 360.

* A quaint old village existed in each of these districts from a period long prior to the rise of Liverpool, with the exception of that denominated "Cabbage Hall." The origin of this name is in danger of being lost. A Col. Townsend lived in a large house in the thoroughfare, now called Townsend Lane, and he decorated the entrance gates by a huge representation of a pine-apple on either side. In that day children had no knowledge of pine-apples; to them the things were cabbages, hence the great house so decorated, they described as "The Cabbage Hall."

In Manchester, where the Welsh infusion is lighter, we have the Smiths heading the list with 1,520 entries. The Jones brotherhood make a fair showing with 1,330. Corresponding figures to those above given are : Williams, 760 ; Wood, 620 ; Robinson, 570 ; Roberts, 450 ; Hughes, 340 ; Richardson, 300.

The Welsh Settler.

The Welsh settler usually adopts an occupation connected with the construction and management of property. In Liverpool, he is a bricklayer, mason, joiner, plumber, or plasterer. But that relates only to the first generation. The second generation makes claim to black clothes ; thus we have master builders, rent collectors, estate agents, architects, etc. In Manchester, the second generation finds entrance to some branch of the staple industry of the county. When the Welshman comes from the coast, particularly from Glamorgan, Carmarthen, and Pembroke, neither mill nor bricklaying has any attraction ; the call of the sea is in the blood. Many of the most efficient navigators in our mercantile marine are Welshmen.

The Scotsman.

The Scotsman is as strong in the two principal towns of Lancashire as in London. Abroad, the Scotsman is banker, auditor, accountant, merchant. In Lancashire we seem to have drawn upon another class : from the Lowlands more than the Highlands. He is a force in all departments of engineering, particularly marine engineering, a fact that would suggest that he usually hails from the Clyde. Shipping offices, too, are largely recruited from Scotland. " Elder " and " Dempster " are both Scottish names, but it was a " Jones " that brought the concern indicated to the forefront.

The value of a good groundwork by education, is nowhere more evident than among Lancashire's industrial recruits. It is a rare circumstance to find a Welshman, or a Scotsman, engaged in a purely labouring capacity, though neither arrives with more than the proverbial half-crown in his pocket.

The Irishman.

The Irishman brings broader sympathies, and readier wit, than either. He has in his blood a substantial quota of the natural refinement that belongs to the old heroic tales of his incomparable mythology, and yet, alas ! he is often utterly abased when required to write or spell his name ! The result is to be seen everywhere—the Irishman is ever the hewer of wood, and the drawer of water. The heavy task, the dirty job is the Irishman's cheerful fate. He can talk politics with any peer of the realm, sensibly, courteously, and without a trace of presumption, which such liberty would inspire in the mind of the average Briton, but, unhappily, he cannot check his weekly wage by the hour-sheet.

And yet those sons of Erin, who have been enabled to avail themselves of the education of the Dublin University, soon reveal the inherent depth of Irish culture. They are our ablest recruits to Surgery, our most eloquent pleaders at the Bar, our most efficient Journalists.

The Manxman.

The little Isle of Man which is represented in the two ports of Lancashire by a body of recruits, large out of all proportion to the tiny land from which they hail, is composed, as a rule, of bakers, sailors, and policemen. The joint faculty of ploughing land and sea is a Manxman's proper vocation. Many of the Island's sons are successful officers in the merchant shipping ; that more are not so reveals, as in the case of Ireland, the shortcomings of his own land, viz., the failure of the educational authorities to link up the elementary school to the after career.

A few Manxmen enter the Wesleyan Methodist ministry; few, or none at all enter upon a medical, or even a legal training, though the cunning of the Athol Street Advocate is acknowledged with suspicious enthusiasm.

Lancashire—our Second Mother.

In the face of this fact—that the population of Lancashire at the beginning of the nineteenth century was less than three-quarters of a million, at the end between four and five millions, an interesting speculation suggests itself—what will be the nature of the amalgam that is emerging from the union of peoples of such widely differing characteristics? Will the Welshman in liberty and prosperity, first patronise, and finally abandon the chapel? Will the Scotsman broaden? Will the Irishman break the chains which a lack of school education imposes upon him? Will the Manxman discard his puffed-up insularities?

Further Afield.

So much relates to the union of people closely knit by one imperial tie. What of those others? In the past, Manchester has opened her gates to an enormous horde of German-speaking peoples, chiefly of Jewish faith and Prussian and Polish nationality. Liverpool has recruited her sugar houses from Hungary and thereby introduced us to a distinct strain of Asiatic blood, kin to that of the Finns and the Basques. More recently a Mongolian amalgam has begun to appear by reason of the presence of thousands of Chinese laundrymen.

The sea is always the link, mountains alone separate. I have found Liverpool and Manchester better known to the people of Malaga, Velez-Malaga, Alicante, Valencia and Barcelona than the capital of the British Empire, solely by reason of the steamers which maintain regular sailings. In the Lancashire ports we have a substantial number of Spanish families engaged in the fruit and wine trades, while South American houses are responsible for a still larger infusion.

Trade with Portugal and Brazil has accustomed us to the presence of the native-born Portuguese and the Portuguese-speaking Brazilian, in whom the racial traditions of the Jew and the Negro are still sufficiently obvious. Weekly sailings to West Africa have long made us familiar with one or other of the many tribes inhabiting Sierra Leone, the Gold Coast, Nigeria, etc. I have encountered men of the tribe of the Madinkahs, born in the region of Timbucto, who at the stride of one generation have absorbed our speech, habits of mind and general civilisation to an amazing degree. A great deal of nonsense has been talked upon the negro question and I confess I have contributed more than my share thereto. My penitence is my only claim to absolution.

Absorption.

My own faith in the grit and character of Lancashire is so firm, that I believe she will digest her big meal of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries with comfort and ease. Climate, as a determining factor, is not to be compared in every case to the potency of money and environment. In America the Irishman, with a stout bundle of United States Treasury notes in his breast pocket, is indistinguishable; he has not preserved one gracious trait of his ancestry.

The process in operation in Lancashire is not invasion and conquest; it is infiltration and absorption.

Manchester.

Lancashire is the seat of the cotton manufacture of the world and Manchester is the market-place of this immense trade—second only in national importance to agriculture. The principal towns engaged in the industry are (besides Manchester itself): Bolton, Oldham, Preston, Accrington, Rochdale, Heywood, Bury, Wigan, Chorley, Blackburn, Burnley, Nelson and Colne.

The rich coalfields lying around these towns show a total output about equal to that of Yorkshire, and second only to that of Durham. The manufacture of machinery and tools for use in the cotton mills, and allied trades, viz., printing, bleaching, etc., is of itself a considerable industry. The opening of the Ship Canal in 1894 gave an impetus to engine construction in Manchester, to the development of the fruit trade with Spain and the West Indies, and the starting of many other activities directly arising out of the conversion of an inland town into a great port for sea-going vessels.

Liverpool.

Liverpool owes its prosperity to its natural facilities for carrying on a profitable import and export trade (in which cotton figures largely), to shipyards (now chiefly on the Cheshire side of the Mersey) and to a dock system of the most complete character.

The familiar jibe is that every brick in the old town is cemented in its holding with a negro's blood. The taint of participation in the West African slave trade is acknowledged; some of the black holes in which black men and women—" images of God cut in ebony " was Fuller's fine tribute three hundred years ago—were held in chains, whilst awaiting trans-shipment, have only recently disappeared from the lower end of Duke Street.

Sugar, flour, tobacco, whisky, British wines, tea, beer, cattle, bacon, lard, eggs, cream substitutes for cattle, agricultural manures (Chilian nitrate, etc.), writing and printing inks, matches, blacking, washing blue, etc., all represent profitable industries, though, obviously, they cannot all be classed as of local " manufacture " when, as in the case of tea, the article is sold to the consumer practically in the same state as it is received from abroad. The crushing of palm kernels yielding oil for margarine, which twenty-five years ago we allowed to drift to Germany, is a definite project. The manufacture of watches, " Harrington," " Wellington," and " Herculaneum " china has disappeared. Ships' bread (i.e. biscuits for sailing ships making long voyages) and sail cloth are drifting from view with the tendency of the wind-jammer to disappear from the trade routes of the sea.

Other towns.

Chemicals are produced at Widnes; oil cloths and linoleums at Lancaster; glass at St. Helens; soap at Preston and Warrington; leather, doors and window frames at Warrington. The watch trade has died a natural death at Prescot, leaving no trace save tall factory buildings and a few workmen chiefly engaged in the manufacture of mathematical instrument " parts." A great industry has arisen in its stead, i.e. the manufacture ofi nsulated electric wires, in which thousands of people are engaged under the ægis of one company with a capital running into seven figures. The sea fisheries find natural centres at Fleetwood and Liverpool. Since the beginning of the war, Barrow-in-Furness has grown in population to an extent that has surpassed the gift of prophets. Shipbuilding, iron smelting and coal getting, together with a few special incidental industries fitting to women, have drawn to the town an overflowing population. Nearly every centre of population has one or more breweries; those of Warrington, Manchester, Liverpool and Knotty Ash are appreciated outside the immediate area of production.

Seaside Playgrounds.

Blackpool, Southport, Lytham, St. Annes-on-Sea, Fleetwood, Morecambe, and Grange-over-Sands, are the seaside playgrounds of the county.

Distinguished Families.

"Burscough Priory," after the mitred houses of Furness and Whalley, "was one of the most considerable religious houses in Lancashire." Thus writes Mr. James Bromley, a learned archæologist, in a privately printed account of excavations he carried out, at the cost of Lord Derby, in 1886.

The pious founder was one Robert Fitz Henry de Lathom, who died in 1174. His grandson married Katharine, daughter and heiress of Thomas de Knowsley (died 1325). The male line terminated in a grandson, Thomas de Lathom (died 1383). His sister Isabella inherited the estates and she married Sir John Stanley, Steward to the Household of Henry IV. and Lord of Man (1407). The Earldom of Derby dates from 1485.

The Molyneuxes of Sephton (now Sefton) and Croxteth are presumed to be descended from William de Molines, who came to England with the Conqueror, and who is on the roll of Battle Abbey. Their story is the story of Lancashire, with Ireland added. The place-name Maghull, near Aintree, recalls the valour of a member of this family in warfare against "The Great Mogul."

The Bootle Wilbrahams date from 1421 (or earlier). The union with the Wilbrahams of Cheshire took place in 1755. The head of the house was made Baron Skelmersdale in 1828, Earl of Lathom in 1880.

The Lindsays of Crawford and Balcarres may be of Saxon origin. There was a Baron Lindsay of Crawford before 1143; of Balcarres in 1633. The Earldom, now held by the 27th of the line, dates from 1398. In Lancashire the family represents the Bradshaighs, of Haigh Hall, Wigan.

The Gerards of Bryn are descended from an old Tuscan family. A collateral branch is the Gerards of Ince. The present Lord Gerard, of Garswood, Newton-le-Willows, is the third Baron (created 1876).

Recent Elevations.

Additions to the Peerage include the following:—

Lord Cross, of Eccle Rigg, Broughton-in-Furness. The present holder of the title has a post in the Treasury. He is the grandson of the first Peer, who represented Preston in Parliament from 1857 to 1862, South-West Lancashire from 1868, occupying the position of Home Secretary, 1874-1880, and 1885-1886, when he was made a Viscount. In his later years he acted (so it was understood) as personal business adviser to Queen Victoria.

Lord Crawshaw, of Crawshaw Hall, Rawtenstall. The founder of this house was John Brooks—the associate of Cobden, Bright, and Villiers—whose son Thomas was created a Baronet in 1891, and a Peer in 1892.

Lord Shuttleworth, of Gawthorpe Hall, Burnley, formerly the Right Hon. Sir Ughtred James Kay-Shuttleworth, P.C., LL.D., Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, 1886, and Lord-Lieutenant, 1912. Lord Shuttleworth is the second Baronet (created 1849), and the first Peer (created 1902).

Lord Ashton, of Ashton Hall, near Lancaster, formerly James Williamson, manufacturer, and Member of Parliament for the Lancaster Division, North-West Lancashire, 1886-1895, High Sheriff, 1885, was raised to the Peerage, 1859.

Viscount Morley, of Blackburn, formerly the Right Hon. John Morley, P.C., O.M., M.A., F.R.S., LL.D., D.C.L., author of Lives of "Cobden" (1881) and "Gladstone" (1903), "Studies of Voltaire" (1871), "Rousseau" (1873), and "Cromwell" (1900), was created Viscount, 1908.

Lord Mersey, of Toxteth, formerly the Right Hon. Sir John Charles Bigham, was created a Knight in 1897, a Privy Councillor in 1909, a Peer in 1910.

Lord Rotherham, of Broughton, formerly Sir Wm. Henry Holland, Bart., M.P. for North Salford (Lancs.), 1892–5; Rotherham (West Riding, Yorks.), 1899–1910; was created a Knight in 1902, a Baronet in 1907, a Peer in 1910.

Lord Rochdale, of Beechwood, Rochdale, formerly Sir George Kemp, Member of Parliament for Heywood, 1895-1906, North-West Manchester, 1910-1912, was created a Knight in 1909, and a Peer in 1913.

Lord Leverhulme, of Thornton Manor, Thornton Hough, Cheshire, formerly Sir William Hesketh Lever; Grand Officer of the Order of Leopold II., Hon. A.R.I.B.A., was born at Bolton in 1851, and retains a seat at Rivington Pike. He sat in Parliament as member for Wirral, 1906–10, was created a Baronet in 1911, and a Peer in 1917.

All the above recent elevations to the Peerage are of the rank of Barons, save where otherwise indicated.

Honoured Names.

It would be impossible for me, however, to attempt to recall even the foremost names, though a few come to mind as I write: Withington (with the names Thomas Ellames always associated with the head of the house), Leigh (both John Shaw and John Gerard), Hoghton or Hoton (the place-name Aughton is a mis-spelling), Atherton, Anderton, Tylesley, *Tildesley or Tyldsley, Radcliffe or Redycliffe (common to the northern counties), Ireland-Blackburne, Weld Blundell, Ince Blundell, Townsend, Bold, Moore, Pilkington, Assheton, *Asheton or Ashton, *Greenhalgh, Holt, Stanley, *Girlington, *Walmesley, Orrell, *Nowell, Preston, Norris, *Fleetwood, *Farrington, Heywood, *Kirby, *Banastre, *Boteler, Rigby, *Ingleton, Hollingworth, Wroe, Horrocks or Horrox (the first was the spelling of the long cloth maker, the latter was that of Jeremiah, the astronomer). Additions to my list will occur to every reader, and if he would refresh his memory for others, let him turn to the pages next following and see how many of the old families still survive.

An Ancient Link.

The family affording a link with the remotest past is, possibly, that of Ireland-Blackburne. Johannes de Hibernia is the reputed founder. He came over with the Conqueror and settled at Hutt. Traces of the mansion house survive near the present Hale Hall, which has been in the occupation of the family since 1190 (or earlier). We are not in the domain of indisputable fact, however, till we come to 1308, when Adam de Ireland, of Hutt, married Avena, heiress of Sir Robert Holland, and thereby united two properties. Cromwell made Sir Gilbert Ireland Governor of Chester Castle. Sir Gilbert's niece, and heiress, married Thomas Blackburne, of Orford, a family whose descent has been traced from the Deans of Whalley, a genealogy, if established, older than the Norman Conquest by some 170 years.†

* At the Restoration it was decided to distinguish these families by a special order of knighthood as a mark of Royal appreciation of loyalty to the House of Stuart, but Charles II. never carried the idea to completion.

 Two families of the same surname with honours for both.

See also "Lists of Esquires and Gentlemen in Cheshire and Lancashire who refused the order of Knighthood at the Coronation of Charles." Edited by J. P. Earwaker. Record Society. Vol. XII.

During the eleven years of the personal government of Charles I. (1629-1640), the King resorted to many expedients to replenish his depleted exchequer, among them being a revival of the right of the Crown to impose knighthood upon the landed gentry. Heads of houses preferred to make terms with the King rather than accept so doubtful a distinction.

† "The Childe of Hale." Sir Gilbert Ireland won immense fame by the possession of a personal servant, who—granting that Goliath was of a height "four cubits and a span," and not "six and a half cubits"—was the tallest man who ever lived. John

Our Own Peerage.

Lancashire has her own peerage, and it is a peerage worthy of the workshop of the world. No handle to their names could heighten the regard we all feel for those of honoured and historic name, who, happily, still with us, are sustaining the high tradition, not only of their individual families, but of the county as a whole.

The Families of To-morrow.

We are essentially a trading community to-day; on that account we are prone to estimate a man's worth by what he has gathered, rather than by what he has given away; by what he has made and held, rather than by what he has sought and dedicated to the public service. I cannot imagine a more humbling experience for the newly-rich of the purse-proud type, than a glance at any old large scale map of the county. In vain they look for the merest hint of their name. Never an old time document is brought to the light of modern day, bearing a hint of their line.

I do not wish, however, to exalt the dead at the cost of the living, to regard land as necessarily an ennobling trust and, on the other hand, a great steamer, or large factory, teeming with life, as an ignoble monument of a man's intelligent industry. It is true that Lancashire has lifted many men of humble state into positions of great prosperity, and left many men of an ancient line in positions of comparative poverty and obscurity. But we have no more right to regard wealth as the badge of advancement and refinement, than we have to regard gentle birth as the hall-mark of respectability or the palliative of idleness. All depends upon the use of our riches, whether those riches be of mind, or heart, or pocket. Let us judge (where we must judge), not by the wine drunk, but by the wine poured forth.

Commercial life rarely provides an incident so arrestive to the eye that it can be signalised as an act of great bravery. Yet I venture to think that those qualities which, in the old days, went to make a courageous warrior and a gentle knight, are capable of as much expression to-day, as at any time in our long history.

The Climate.

Cold and damp are the distinguishing features. In localities lying open to the sun and sheltered from the bitter east wind and the tempestuous westerly gales, the climate can be both mild and genial. Along the coast, too, where the sea is warm (except in April and May), and where the rays of the sun are not impeded by the dense smoke of a countless host of factory chimneys, the climate can be fairly agreeable, even in midwinter. But where a town backs on to a substantial elevation—Chorley, Bolton, Bury and Oldham for instance—the rainfall is heavy, the sunshine restricted, and the prevailing temperature correspondingly low. The entire county provides, by reason of its westerly situation, an attraction to rain. At Rivington Pike, where Liverpool has a

Middleton, the so-called "Childe of Hale," was nine feet three inches in height, compared with the eight feet nine inches of Goliath. James I. was so interested in this physical curiosity, that he commanded Sir Gilbert Ireland to exhibit the giant at Court. The King was vastly entertained by the great height, immense bulk, and many feats of strength which his mightiest subject was enabled to display before him. "The Childe" received twenty guineas, as a tribute to his bigness. The era was one of almost uninterrupted peace, or this veritable son of Anak might have been afforded other opportunities of displaying his patriotism, and his prowess in conjunction. Sir Gilbert brought his bodyguard home via Oxford, where the Lancashire students at Brasenose College made a great fuss of their fellow-countryman. They painted the Childe's portrait, marked his height on the wall, cut the shape of his foot on the cellar steps, and on the buttery wall marked the limits of his reach, and the shape of his hand.

In the churchyard at Hale, the grave of the giant is a constant object of interest. The tombstone is inscribed: "Here Lyeth the Bodie of Middleton, the Childe. Nine feet three. Born 1578, Dyede 1623" (see Dr. Léon in The Philomath, September, 1914).

large reservoir, the fall is fully half as much again as the average for the county as a whole. The watershed of Thirlmere Lake, the reservoir of Manchester, is within a few miles from Lancashire's northern boundary.

Agriculture.

The great bulk of the land is still agricultural. On the hills hardy native sheep are reared; on the lowlands, chiefly on permanent pasture, there are more cows (and perhaps more horses) than can be counted in any similar area in England.

The amount of land under regular cultivation is very low. Of grain crops, oats take a first place, a fact that points to a light soil and a late climate. The heavily manured fields of the Mersey basin. yield a good crop of vegetables, among which an early potato may be noted. We have also an excellent home-made cheese, chiefly from the Fylde district.

A large area is wholly lost by rubbish from the coal pits, and waste-heaps from other industries.

Agriculture in Lancashire presents many problems, certain of them are peculiar to the county. The whole subject calls for immediate attention.

Ecclesiastical History.

The slow development of the county is revealed in a few facts and dates from our ecclesiastical history.

The whole of Lancashire is in the province of York, which became an Archiepiscopal See in 735. The Scandinavian invasion destroyed much of the church organisation of England; the succession to the Sees became irregular and the precise area covered by a bishop's authority uncertain.

Lancashire first comes definitely into view when, in 923, that part of the county lying between the Mersey and the Ribble was placed in the charge of the Bishop of Lichfield, in the archdeaconry of Chester. The county north of the Ribble belonged to the Archdeaconry of Richmond, in the diocese of York.

In the eleventh century, the Church in England adopted a rule from the Continent, viz., that of placing the Bishop's seat in the largest or most important town of the diocese. Exeter was thus made in 1050 the seat of the Bishop of the united dioceses of Crediton and Cornwall, and twenty-five years later the Council of London sanctioned several such changes, including that of the removal of the See of Lichfield, first to Chester, and then to Coventry.

The Bishopric of Manchester.

When, in 1541, Chester was constituted a separate diocese, in lieu of the archdeaconry formerly existing, the whole of Lancashire was allocated to the new See. In the passage of time the anomaly became grotesque. By the year 1847, when the See of Manchester was founded, Lancashire was the home of an immense and ever-growing population. To the new diocese was apportioned all Lancashire, save certain parts of the hundred of West Derby. The busy and ever-expanding port of Liverpool, therefore, still remained linked to the quiet but picturesque little city of the Dee. Furness and Cartmel were detached from Manchester and added to Carlisle in 1856.

Liverpool a Diocese.

The diocese of Liverpool dates from 1878. Chester now lost, after more than eight centuries, all further concern with Lancashire—material or spiritual—while from the jurisdiction of the chief of the Manchester diocese there was subtracted a strip of territory lying to the east as far as Warrington.

It is not a little remarkable that the most populous county of England should have been no more than an appanage of an outside Bishopric, until almost the middle of the nineteenth century, by which time the population included in the County Palatine was numbered by the million.

Unitarianism and Quakerism.

Among all religious bodies I find that Unitarianism is generally regarded as a great force in Lancashire, not by reason of the multiplicity of congregations, but by the eminence, influence and high-mindedness of the men and women professing attachment to the creedless church. In Manchester, Liverpool, Bolton and elsewhere, the Unitarians are in the forefront of every movement for the social well-being; often they are large employers of labour. Historic Quakerism seems in process of absorption by two extremes—High Churchmanship on the one hand, Unitarianism on the other, constituting the " warm " of emotionalism, and the " cold " of intellect.

Roman Catholic and Nonconformist Churches.

After the Church of England (whose strength and progress have been already indicated), Roman Catholicism takes a first place in particular centres like Preston and Liverpool. Wesleyanism is the strongest of all Nonconformist bodies; thereafter must be counted the Congregational, Presbyterian, Baptist, Calvinist, Primitive Methodist, Pastor Russellite, Christian Scientist, Theosophists, and other religious organisations, too numerous for individual mention. Among some groups, the principle of an unpaid ministry is regarded as of vital importance.

Early and Eastern Faiths.

The Greek Church is fittingly represented in Liverpool. The only Armenian Church in the British Isles is in Manchester. The Jews have erected, of late years, many new synagogues in Manchester and Liverpool. Premature death closed the seemingly distinguished career awaiting the son of the late Chief Rabbi. The late Rev. Alfred Adler is a fragrant memory within and without the community. The second great faith of the world, after that of Buddhism, is Islam. There was an Islamite mission in Liverpool, but the Mosque is now established in permanence at Woking; to the Imam, the India Office delegated important functions, connected with the fallen heroes among our Indian troops, in the Great War.

" Fancy Religions."

Antinomianism, a very old cult, has disappeared, I think, from Lancashire altogether, but only within living memory; not so, however, the Latter Day Saints, who have long maintained their English headquarters in Liverpool, whence The Millennial Star, first edited and published in Liverpool, in 1839, is regularly circulated.

It is not a little remarkable that with all the hard-headedness of which Lancashire rightly makes boast, any and all religious cults find adherents. We may be able to turn a balance sheet inside out, but when it comes to a "proposition," as the Americans say, for which no documents are produced, we (or many of us) are easy captures. The Book of Mormon, Chapter II., " The Book of Jacob " (fifth European edition, 1854, p. 118) expressly prohibited polygamy. But of what concern is that fact, once the spirit of the convert is steeped in credulity?

Indifferentism.

It would be manifestly unfair, however, to regard the continued existence of any more or less restricted cult as typical of the county as a whole. If I were asked to name the most conspicuous change in Lancashire life within the past twenty-five years, I would unhesitatingly say that it lay, not in the direction of any branch of orthodoxy, or ethical study, or humanism, or even of flagrant secularism, but in the direction of indifferentism, as distinct from indifference, i.e. a reasoned disregard, as distinct from mere apathy.

"Artifex" in a recent issue of the Manchester Guardian (October 5th, 1916) comments on the humiliation of having to preach a religion which few people take seriously. "If the majority of men repudiated Christianity altogether, and stoned the clergy for preaching it, the position would really be more tolerable. . . . But there is no hostility to Christianity to-day. Indeed, most people seem rather in favour of a little of it. . . . It is only the idea that the doctrines of the Gospel are applicable in public or international relations which seems to all level-headed business men and men of the world as obviously absurd and dangerous."

"When the Churches were full——"

Another member of the cloth gave me, shortly before the War, his view of the situation. "If I am in any danger of being puffed up," he said, "by recalling favours of the past, when the church was crowded, and they had to bring in the chairs from the vestry, and fill up the aisles with forms from the schoolroom, in order to accommodate the large bodies of people who once waited upon my words, I have to remember how I was humbled to the dust as I passed away—the public-houses were equally congested. It was the same story everywhere; when the churches were full, the jails were full. And now that the churches are empty, the public-houses are complaining of a great slackening of trade, and many jails have had to be pulled down because there was 'nothing doing,' and builders wanted the site for the erection of workmen's dwellings. I do not suggest that the crowded church, the congested public-house, and the full jail, were interdependent facts—God forbid. I merely draw attention to the fact that they were contemporaneous features, not merely of Lancashire history, but of English history as a whole. And that now, we have an equally amazing circumstance: the empty church and the empty jail, are, similarly, features of our present day existence."

The Rise of the Sunday School.

The Sunday School was once the great "feeder" of the church. Originally, the education of the children was secular, as well as religious, and though the lessons, in writing and arithmetic, were of a very rudimentary character, it was usual to pay the teachers for their services.

Oldham enjoys the distinction of being the first town in England to enlist the aid of honorary workers. For many years the assembly of the Sunday School, in the morning at 8, then 8.30, and latterly at 9.30; in the afternoon at 2.30, proved a great power in the land, particularly in relation to the work of Nonconformist churches and chapels. Many Lancashire men trace their moral worth and material gains to their enlistment under the Sunday School banner.

In the southern, or agricultural, counties of England, the Sunday School was usually spoken of as "the ragged children's school," but in Lancashire, as in Ireland, where Protestantism is a great unifying force, the institution provided a common bond of fellowship. The schools were not attended solely by the young; elder scholars did not leave even on reaching early manhood and womanhood. As teachers resigned their tasks, recruits to the teaching staff were found among the classes of the elder scholars.

The association of young men and women in a common task of great usefulness, constantly led to friendship, and to marriage, and it was in the nature of things that the children of such unions should sustain the traditions of their parents' lives, by entering the Sunday School.

Causes of the Decline.

The decline is due to a variety of causes. (1) The Sunday School was never a very popular feature of the work of the Church of England, so long as Church Day Schools flourished. The High Church movement introduced other agencies for "looking after the children"; besides, the Anglican priest never had too kind an eye for the lay helper in the domain of spiritual instruction. (2) The passing of the Elementary Education Act of 1870, by which the ability to read became the birthright of all. (3) The disposition of the old-time "elder scholar" to consider his own education first. He looks to Sunday, if wet, for his own reading of books, magazines, and Sunday newspapers (the latter frequently provide him with a diet of Rationalist thought and a chronicle of clerical delinquencies); if fine, to recreation in the open-air, if married, with his wife and bairns; if unmarried, with the lady of his choice. (4) The facilities which motor omnibuses afford for a change of environment, music, and tea in the parks in the afternoon, a concert or "pictures" in the evening. (5) Many women are now engaged in factories, shops, and offices, or following professional careers. They hold to the idea that they have earned their day of rest, or recreation. In any case, since the advent of lawn tennis, bicycle, and golf clubs, they are no longer dependent upon the Sunday School for their friendships. (6) The widespread disposition to question the authority of the clergy, and to regard the Church merely as a useful moral agency for keeping "the lower orders" in subjection, civil to their "betters," and generally "good."

Certain of these points have a wider significance, inasmuch as they explain, to some extent, the decline in church attendance and the progress of indifferentism.

The Great Leveller.

The widespread notion that indifference, or indifferentism, affects the Protestant community alone, is not based on fact. The leakage from Roman Catholicism is represented to me as being, proportionately, quite as high. Figures are unobtainable. A careful record is kept of converts to the faith, but it is manifestly impossible to set down in any book a slackening of interest, covering, perhaps, a long period, and only maturing in an acknowledged estrangement, after a lapse of many years. The tendency to drift is unmistakable, and though I may be indignantly assailed for saying so, the impression remains with those most competent to express an opinion.

One test is easy. Do other communities with an equally strict code of observance fare any better? Manifestly not. Among Jews, every trading instinct, and every social influence, seem to lure them from the faith of Israel. In Lancashire we see the first settler is strictly orthodox; this is a very natural expression of his gratitude for escape from thraldom. His children, however, have no appreciation of penalties they have never suffered. Besides, social convention is strictly opposed to any religious display, particularly if it has not the sanction and prestige, of comfortable, respectable, well-to-do, English orthodoxy. The slackening hold of the synagogue is soon manifest; the hardening process is only a matter of time.

Lord Cromer has also testified to the fact that where the West comes into contact with the East, there is "an ever-increasing class of Moslems who are merely nominal believers in the faith of Islam, and who may be practically classed as Agnostics."

Town life is the great leveller. A common environment produces a uniformity of outlook and education, and both make for that community of interest which breaks down every socially separating barrier.

Dr. Adler, referring to what he regarded as a mental impossibility—a conversion from Judaism to the Cross—said to me: "A bad Jew makes a worse Christian, but he never ceases to be a Jew." I cannot imagine what that gentle and refined scholar would have said of the unmistakable growth of indifferentism.

Not Irreligious.

Yet the people of Lancashire are not irreligious in the wider sense of that term.

No one can pass through the streets of any factory, or colliery district, on any Sunday evening, without noting the vast improvement in the habits, character, and comforts of the typical working-class house.

The heart of the people is sound—never more so. Nowhere in the country is the response to the call of charity, or national honour, so quick as in Lancashire—it comes with the full of both hands, from cottage and hall. The radiating light of two great Universities is on education everywhere. The evidences of an advancing civilisation are visible on every hand—books, newspapers and pictures. Temperance has made giant strides. Every home has the taste, the aptitude and the faculty of a musical evening, or an hour at cards. Not a household that does not make provision for a week, or a couple of weeks, at the seaside, at least once in every year.

In a word, Lancashire loves play as it loves work, and gratifies both ambitions with all its might.

Lancashire's Lead.

The pride of Lancashire, "What Lancashire says to-day, England will say to-morrow," would be vain without some support from modern history.

Temperance.

Whether the temperance movement started at Warrington, Bolton or Preston is a matter of some dispute, but there is no doubt that it was the action of "the Seven Men of Preston," who, in 1832, attached their signatures to a memorandum by which they pledged themselves to total abstinence, that gave the movement public importance. One of the seven was a connection of my own family. The term, "teetotal," stands for "tee-tee-total." Over and over again this is represented as indicative of the stumbling speech of one of the septette. As a matter of fact, Richard Turner, the man in question, was not a stutterer; he simply toyed with the initial "t" in "total" very much as some men do, nowadays, with "absolute" and as some women do with "awful." Where the vocabulary is small, many people of limited scholarship resort to an unnatural emphasis of a word which they remember, and think they understand. By this means, they endeavour to enforce an argument by stress, drawl, emphasis, or mere reiteration.

The progress of the temperance movement is one of the wonders of the age. With prohibition in force in Russia and France, the teetotal pledge of "the seven men of Preston" more than ever stands out as an example of Lancashire leading the way. Manchester may claim to be the home of the movements for Sunday Closing and for Prohibition. In the days of S. Pope, Q.C., and the late Sir Wilfrid Lawson, the United Kingdom Alliance made Prohibition a burning question.

Free Trade and Freed Land.

Cobden (I have already alluded to Bright) was not a Lancashire man, though I see him described, in one of the encyclopædias, as "the representative man of the Manchester school." He was one of another septette, and out of the combination, formed in 1838, grew the Anti-Corn Law League. Backed by Cobden's tireless zeal for Free Trade in corn (and in land also, if possible), this body established, under Sir Robert Peel, the leading, or more urgently called-for principle in their programme, in 1846.

Cobden was typical of the county in his devotion to trade. At a time when we are pillorying his theories, and arranging the basis of a commercial bond with our Allies in war, it is worth remembering that Cobden combated Russophobia, as far back as 1836. He did this with an enthusiasm and far-sightedness that ought to have saved us from the folly of "backing the wrong horse" (to use Lord Salisbury's words) in the Crimean War. He also concluded a commercial treaty with France, in 1860.

Cobden's great dream, however, was of a freed land for the English, England for the English, or "Back to the Land," as we now call it, in order to solidify at their source of origin our national strength and productiveness. We applied the Cobden salve, but forgot the Cobden medicine.

Did Lancashire teach Cobden all that he ever knew? In that event we have ground for claiming him as one of Lancashire's aptest pupils, and if he were not a Lancastrian in blood, he was in mind, and his biography has been written by that true and distinguished son of our soil, Lord Morley of Blackburn.

Co-operation.

Co-operation has made great strides since twenty-eight weavers, Socialists of the old Richard Owen and Chartist school, painfully collected £28 and started the Rochdale Society of Equitable Pioneers in 1844. Holyoake has told the story in his "History" (1875-1879) and "Self-Help" (1888). London has been a successful imitator: witness the many "Stores" established in public favour on the co-operative principle.

Food Reform.

The Vegetarian Society (established 1846), the oldest and most important society in England concerning itself with the question of food reform and the promulgation of the idea of the beauty of all life to a pure mind in a clean body, has had its headquarters and its most active workers in Manchester for many years.

Where the appeal to humanitarianism and the higher senses has failed, the evils attaching to a flesh diet have operated, with the result that a steadily increasing measure of success has attended the work of the society—which is international in its scope.

Over the period of the last twenty-five years or more there has been a growing tendency among cultured people to restrict the consumption of flesh food. The suggestion that cancer, appendicitis, and other ills find an easy victim in the heavy flesh-eater, has proved a powerful lever in the progress of the cause.

Since the beginning of the War, vegetarianism has made giant strides; the semi-compulsory Lenten fast of 1917 has afforded grim satisfaction to the fathers of the movement in Lancashire. Where love could not induce, necessity drives.

Friendly Societies.

In the region of self-help we have the Manchester Unity of Oddfellows, to which my father devoted the larger half of a long life, and two immensely powerful organisations, the Royal Liver and the Liverpool Victoria Friendly Societies, Lancashire again leading the way.

Reference and Lending Libraries.

Humphrey Chetham established a great reference library in Manchester as far back as 1653. The collection was at one time the largest in the kingdom, those of London, Oxford, and Cambridge alone excepted.

There is considerable doubt, however, as to the claim of the Chetham Library to priority. Dr. Alfred A. Mumford has recently shown that Manchester possessed a town library several years earlier, and that as a result of the many facilities for scholarship, Manchester attained a high reputation for study in mathematics, natural philosophy, constitutional law, Hebrew, and theology.

About the middle of the eighteenth century Liverpool established a proprietary library, and thereby laid the foundation of a local school of learning: witness William Roscoe (1753-1831), the author of "The Life of Lorenzo de Medici, called the Magnificent," and "The History of the Life and Pontificate of Leo X.," and Dr. James Currie (1756-1805), who published "The Works of Robert Burns with an account of his life, and a criticism on his writings" (printed and published in Liverpool, not London as so often represented, in four vols., 1800), a work undertaken by Dr. Currie solely for the purpose of benefiting the family of the poet.

Still England lagged far behind the Continent in the provision of repositories for books. Even in the British Museum, Gibbon was so poorly served, that he declared the greatest city of the world to be still destitute of a public library. The later volumes of the work which made him the first of all English historians, if not also the first of all historians, were written at Lausanne, amid a collection not more than six thousand volumes in extent.

The need of libraries, to which the general public might have easy access, was urgent, and Lancashire led the way. William Ewart, who was born in Liverpool, and for some years represented his native city in the House of Commons (Wigan and Dumfries thereafter), got several bills through Parliament advancing the cause of his dearly loved idea. The principal measure (1850) empowered local authorities to levy a rate of a halfpenny (in 1855 increased to a penny) in the pound, for the upkeep of such institutions.

A Neck and Neck Race.

The great boroughs were spurred into activity. The keen rivalry of the two chief towns of Lancashire is proverbial. An encyclopædia states that Manchester "led the way" in 1852 and that the library of Liverpool was not opened till 1860. This conveys an entirely false impression. It was, as it ought to be always, a neck and neck race.

The Liverpool Council pledged themselves by vote on the 14th of April, 1850, and the date "1850" is borne on the first catalogue, as being the year in which the collection was first formed. On the 18th of October, 1852, the Library was opened in Duke Street, in premises formerly known as the Union News Room. An enlarged site was soon required, and Ewart's enthusiasm being shared by Sir Wm. Brown, his friend, fellow-townsman and legislative colleague, the latter made gift, in 1857, of £40,000, for the purpose of a new building. This structure, which was opened on the 18th of October, 1860, was made to include the Museum of Antiquities, presented by Joseph Mayer; and (by virtue of a special Act of Parliament) the Museum of Natural History, presented by the 13th Earl of Derby; to which there has since been conjoined the Picton Reading Room (so named to perpetuate the memory of Sir James Allanson Picton, the antiquarian and historian, who presided over the Library, Museum and Arts Committee for the greater part of a long life), built by the Corporation at a cost of about £25,000.

Neither was the idea of free libraries of Scottish origin. It is true that Ewart was of Scottish extraction, but Brown was born at Ballymena, Co. Antrim. The two men were united by another bond of sympathy—the desire to see the establishment of the metric system, both as to our coinage, and to our bewildering scales of weight and measure. In the year of Brown's death (1864), Ewart got a bill through Parliament, legalising the metric system, but, ahead of his time by more than half a century, he died in 1869, without converting Lancashire to this simple expedient of promoting trade and education.

Manchester has a priceless collection of books in the Rylands Library, of which the Spencer Library from Althorp, Northampton, is alone sufficient to distinguish it among the great book treasure houses of the world.

Both cities are dotted with Lending Libraries, whereby "the man is made a better mechanic, and the mechanic a better man." Nearly every town and village has its library. The result is always the same. Where there is a good library, and an earnest and efficient librarian, the whole tone of a community is raised by the ideals of our incomparable literature.

The Suffrage for Women.

The question of a woman's right to vote at elections to Parliament flits slyly across the page of history, as well it might, after the savage opposition men encountered in getting the franchise for themselves, and representation for great centres of wealth and population, like Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, etc. Under such terms as "universal," "adult," and "household" suffrage, the franchise for women was from time to time hinted at, years even before Miss Lydia Becker was born. But to Lancashire in general, and to Miss Becker in particular, belong the distinction of initiating the movement as we know it to-day.

The suitability of the soil was obvious. The familiar jibe, "a woman's place is in the home," is a foolish jest, in a land where so many thousands of women are necessary to the staple industry, and are thereby economically independent. Besides, until legislation intervened, we had women working in the coal-mines, as well as in the weaving-sheds.

Lydia Ernestine Becker was born in 1827. Her father was a calico printer at Accrington, from 1838 to 1865, when the family moved to Manchester. In October, 1866, she attended the meeting of the Social Science Association, and heard the address of Madame Bodichon (Barbara Leigh-Smith). The enthusiasm of Miss Becker was kindled to an extraordinary degree. She formed a committee, wrote an article in the Contemporary Review for March, 1867, and established a society pledged to the cause of women, all within a few months. By 1870 she was a member of the newly created School Board of Manchester, and Editor of, and chief contributor to, The Women's Suffrage Journal, probably the first periodical solely devoted to franchise reform for women.

Miss Becker remained the fountain-head of the movement till her death in 1890. The mantle of reformer then fell to another Manchester lady, of Manx descent. The achievements of Mrs. Pankhurst, in the field of militant agitation, were the history of our daily newspaper, until the War called for a truce to internal strife.

The Champion of Purity.

Another aspect of the woman's cause was taken up by Lancashire, chiefly by Mrs. Josephine Butler, who settled in Liverpool in 1866. Refusing to recognise that standard of morality, by which thousands of women in seaport and garrison towns seemed destined to become the mere toy of men's passion, Mrs. Josephine Butler led the way in a movement wherein much still remains to be done, of which mid-Victorian ideas of morality took no ken.

Mrs. Josephine Elizabeth Butler was born in 1828. In 1896 she published "Personal Reminiscences of a Great Crusade." She died in 1906.

The atrium of the Lady Chapel of the new Liverpool Cathedral contains a reproduction of a drawing of Mrs. Butler in early life, with the inscription: "To Josephine Butler and all brave champions of purity."

"Save the Child."

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children owes its inception to Lancashire, and in particular to the Rev. Benjamin Waugh, of Southport, and for over twenty years Editor of the Sunday Magazine. I remember Hugh Stowell Brown, a famous Lancashire preacher in his day, saying, "It is a cynical tribute to our age that a society for the prevention of cruelty to children should, as it were, grow out of an organisation for the protection of dogs." The cynic, too, might have pointed to the wide gap in years between the establishment of the two agencies.

The Liverpool Society was founded in 1883; the London Society in 1884. The consolidation of an organisation covering the whole country was a life work, and to it Waugh devoted all his energies.

No one without some inside knowledge can form the least idea of the influence, persistency and ferocity of the opposition. In the later years of his life, I spent many a quiet hour with the "Children's Champion" in his garden at St. Alban's and had some opportunity of taking the measure of the man. My memory is enriched by a singularly quiet, gracious and winning personality. Waugh was tremendously in earnest, single-minded, determined. If he ever faltered in his task, opposition provided him with all the zest he required, ever holding to the watchword "Save the child"; a slight variation on "Save the Boy," first used, I think, by Monsignor Nugent, as a plea for support for his home for boys in St. Anne's Street, Liverpool.

When his strength was overcome and his spirit was in danger of breaking, Waugh had one unfailing panacea—a fortnight in a kind of English Trappist monastery where no letters, telegrams, or newspapers are received, and no talk permitted, save for the indulgence of a few minutes in the late afternoon.

The Act called "the Children's Charter" put extraordinarily wide powers within the Society's discretion; it also saved the head of the Society from the machinations of rascally lawyers and other dangers. The "Children's Champion" was born in 1839, and died in 1908. Rosa Waugh issued a biography of her father in 1912.

A Unique Library.

The Hornby Library of fine art books, prints, and autographs, is housed in a building of classic design, adjoining the Picton Reading Room, at Liverpool, and is in charge of Mr. George T. Shaw, the chief librarian to the Corporation.

In 1900 Hugh Frederick Hornby, a merchant of Liverpool, bequeathed his art library of books, prints, and autographs, together with £10,000 "to assist the authorities to provide a building in which to store this collection, and in which the engravings, books, etc., may be exhibited to the public." The catalogue contains nearly 8,000 books, some of great rarity. In addition, there are about 8,500 prints, many of high value, and over 3,000 autographs, all of lasting interest. There is also a very fine collection of the work of modern bookbinders.

Child Life.

Great attention is now being given to the reduction of infantile mortality, by the care of mothers, both before and after childbirth Sir William Hartley has set aside a large sum for the establishment of a pre-natal hospital on modern scientific lines, whilst the medical authority in every big town is stemming the waste by a pure milk supply, open spaces, and the destruction of breeding grounds for the common housefly.

Lancashire in Literature.

All librarians having charge of public collections devote great attention to the enrichment of those sections dealing with Lancashire as a whole, their own locality in particular. The catalogue of these institutions reveal an immense body of books, of which not one-hundredth part can obtain mention in these pages. Lieut.-Col. Henry Fishwick prepared a bibliography, entitled "The Lancashire Library" (1875).

To these lists the reader must refer if he would know (1) the authority for our history ; (2) gauge the contribution of Lancashire authors to the literature of the county ; and (3) measure the activities of authors of Lancashire birth, education, or residence in other fields of learning. But as every house, making any claims to culture and refinement, has its library, and every library has its "Lancashire section," it is fitting that I should detail a few outstanding names and titles.

Books of the Prehistoric Ages.

A Lancashire library may begin with history before history began—with books by Sir Charles Lyell, Huxley, Lubbock, Greenwell, Rolleston, and Boyd Dawkins. The last-named has made a great reputation by his "Cave Hunting, Researches Respecting the Early Inhabitants of Europe" (1874) ; and "Early Man in Britain" (1880). Works like Charles Isaac Elton's "Origins of English History" (1882), and Nottidge Charles Macnamara's slighter volume, "Origin and Character of the British People" (1900), both of which afford a digest of original research, may also find a place in such a collection. In this way, the prehistoric era is linked to the period for which we have something, more or less, remotely resembling a contemporary record.

The Era of Celtica.

For the Celtic ages we have no sure guide, and only for vague and uncertain deduction do we turn to the pages of Irish, French, and Welsh scholars. An immense mass of manuscript material has come down to us from the pens of the Irish annalists—enough to fill 1,500 octavo volumes. Centuries will pass before these great stores have been turned over, deciphered, translated, and published. Meanwhile, we have recourse to work already done ; to books bearing the names of O'Donovan, O'Curry, Joyce, Wood-Martin, and a score more, for the light they throw, now directly, now obliquely, upon the tale of our uprising. In France we have the Celtic studies of H. D'Arbois de Jubainville, Renan, and many others ; in Wales, the rich legacy of Prof. Sir John Rhys ("Celtic Britain," 1882) ; and Prof. Edward Anwyl ("Celtic Religion," 1906)—in truth, almost a whole nation that is devoted to the study of the past. Many place-names, for example, Lancaster (Lun-caster), Liverpool (Lyr's-pool), are inscrutable mysteries without reference to the springs of Celtic faith.

Classic Travellers' Tales.

For the period of the Roman occupation we turn to Cæsar's "Commentaries," Strabo's tales of travel, etc. The scheme of "Monumenta Historica Celtica" (vol. i., 1911) is to present all the references to the Celts that are to be found scattered through the works of Greece and Rome from the tenth century B.C. to the fifth century A.D. Care, however, is necessary in winnowing fact from fiction ; yet, without a trace of misgiving, much of our early history has been compounded hitherto of such imaginative stuff as travellers' tales are often made of. Certain Greek scribes had a fine taste in make-believe ; geography afforded an unrivalled field for the exercise of this alluring art.

To the Venerable Bede we are, in common with the rest of Britain, indebted for the general outline of our history down to A.D. 731. Even when the land we now denominate "Lancashire" first comes definitely into view, we are still provoked by the prevalence of myth and shadow. Dr. Gaster and other learned folk-lorists have shown that King Arthur has many an exact counterpart in ancient story.

Our Individual History.

Our individual history is in process of development in "The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," of which Benjamin Thorpe published a translation (1861). For the period of the Danish-Norwegian invasion and conquest, 795 to 1046, we have the poetic sagas of the northern invader, and such fragments of history as have come down to us from the monks, with whom the Scandinavians first waged a deadly quarrel, and ultimately established a curious imitation of peace. Mr. S. W. Partington's "The Danes in Lancashire" (1909), is a useful addition to this department of our learning, though it makes no pretence to scientific scholarship, either in discovery of fact or presentment of idea.

For the Norman Conquest we turn to the classic work of Freeman, and to the general page of history we refer for those years which marked the creation of a line of Earls of Lancaster, Dukes of Lancaster, the Palatinate, the Duchy, the Civil War, the Protectorate, and the Restoration.

The First Lancashire Book.

The first Lancashire made book is said to have been "A Guide to Heaven," dating from Manchester, 1664; but it is very doubtful if there were any press in the county thirty years earlier than 1694, when the censorship was abolished.

"Tim Bobbin."

The eighteenth century was nearly half spent before the industrial rise had set in. The career of John Collier belongs to the years 1708-1786. He was a schoolmaster and a caricaturist, but made his reputation as a student of the dialect. He first used the pen-name "Tim Bobbin" in 1739. Of his "View of the Lancashire Dialect by way of Dialogue" (1746), there has been a never-ending stream of editions.

John Corry, an Irishman and a journalist, wrote a memoir of "Tim Bobbin." He was the handyman in literature, author of lives of Wm. Cowper, the poet; Joseph Priestly, the chemist and Rationalist; and histories of Liverpool, Bristol, and Macclesfield. His "History of Lancashire," 2 vols., 4 to, is dated 1825.

Baines' History.

Another "History of Lancashire" was also the work of a journalist. Edward Baines was a native, but passed most of his years in Leeds, where he brought up the Mercury to a position of great influence and prosperity. In 1823 he produced a "History, Directory, and Gazetteer of the County of York." From a Liverpool press, in the year next following, he issued a similar work dealing with Lancashire. The material was subsequently rearranged and expanded, and then we had "The History of the County Palatine and Duchy of Lancashire," 4 vols., 4to, 1836. A "new, revised and improved edition," by J. Harland, 2 vols., 4to, appeared 1868-1870, and a further reissue, edited by James Croston, in 1888.

Both Harland and Croston were enthusiastic antiquarians. The first named was a highly efficient shorthand writer in Hull when, in 1830, Taylor, of the Manchester Guardian, brought him to Manchester. He became a student of Lancashire history, edited various volumes of the Chetham Society, and published "Ballads and Songs of Lancashire, chiefly older than the nineteenth century" (1865); with T. T. Wilkinson, "Lancashire Folk Lore" (1867), and was identified with other publications of local concern.

Roby's "Traditions."

"The Traditions of Lancashire," of which John Roby was the author, was first published in 1829. The book, which is still in demand, had a strong appeal to so discriminating an antiquary as Sir Walter Scott, though we are not without a suspicion that Roby drew upon his own fancy in the adorning of a tale.

The Last Words in History.

Besides histories of Kirkham and Rochdale, and the bibliography already referred to, Lieut.-Col. Henry Fishwick was the author of "A History of Lancashire" in a series of popular county histories (1894). County history has its fitting culmination in "The Victoria History of the Counties of England," where, within handsome volumes, all scarlet and gold, modern scholarship finds expression (1906-7).

"The Encyclopædia Britannica" (11th edition) contains an admirable summary covering several pages, and "Chambers' Encyclopædia" produces a handy digest, supplemented by biographical and subject articles scattered through the ten volumes.

Biographies of Worthies.

Hartley Coleridge, the eldest son of the great poet, critic and philosopher, was living with Bingley, a publisher, in Leeds, when a large biographical work dealing with the great names of Lancashire and Yorkshire was projected. Thirteen lives had been written when Bingley failed. Subsequently, Coleridge's work, as far as it had gone, was published under the titles "Biographia Borealis" (1833) and "Worthies of Yorkshire and Lancashire" (1836).

Francis Espinasse issued his well-known "Lancashire Worthies" in 1874, and a second series in 1877. "Lancashire Leaders" was the name given to two rather slender volumes that emerged from an Exeter press at the price of three guineas (1895).

Famous Lancastrians fill a large amount of space in "The National Dictionary of Biography." Many men, whose fame is local, rather than national, are to be found in the old volumes of The Biograph, Men and Women of the Day, and like publications. Nearly every centre of population has its own local honours list, of which Benjamin Guiness Orchard's "Liverpool Legion of Honour" (1893) is, perhaps, the best example, though Orchard's own life contained more moving incident than any one of those whose career he set down with such care and fidelity.

Birds, Churches, and Goblins.

A large number of books must pass without any individual mention; enough to indicate their general scope. They deal with the genealogy of the old families; with the old halls in which those families were, or, happily, are housed; with the geology, mythology, and topography of the county; with the features of the Lancashire sea-coast; with the ancient battle-fields; with birds, churches, and goblins; with gleanings from the country-side and the crowded city; with domestic architecture and the size of the manufacturing towns; with the blossoms of garden and moor; with those flowers of our own inventive fancy that belong to our intellectual youth. Little has been wholly neglected; a thousand pens have endeavoured to tell the tale. To a formidable gathering of books and tracts, must be added an entire library of Transactions of the various learned societies, wherein are to be found many papers of local historic interest.

Histories of Localities.

There is also an immense body of books dealing with the history of individual towns and particular localities. With these I cannot attempt any names in this survey of the literature of the county as a whole; every corporation library has its own list.

The Record Society.

The work of the Record Society of Lancashire and Cheshire, with which Mr. J. Paul Rylands and a group of earnest and able students of history and archæology are identified, calls for definite mention and cordial appreciation. "Lancashire and Cheshire Cases in the Court of Star Chambers," edited by Mr. Arnold Stewart Brown, is the latest addition to an illuminative series.

The Roscoe Family.

When I turn to the work of Lancashire authors in fields of learning outside the county, I can hazard no more than a few names. William Roscoe, the Italian scholar, historian, and abolitionist, has been already referred to. Henry wrote a life of his father. He married Maria, the granddaughter of Dr. William Enfield, the preacher, and author of a "History of Liverpool" (1773). Maria Roscoe had been a widow thirty-two years, when she published "Vittoria Colonna: her life and times" (1868). Sir Henry Enfield Roscoe, the famous chemist, and author of the text-book, "Lessons in Elementary Chemistry" (1866), a world success, was her son. Sir Edward Thorpe has recently published a biography of his distinguished master and friend (1916).

Thomas Roscoe, the fifth son of Wm. Roscoe, wrote books on Venice and Granada, and translated the memoirs of Benvenuto Cellini (1822), but his reputation rests upon translations of continental novelists:—Italian, (1823); German, (1826); Spanish, (1832). William Caldwell Roscoe, a frequent contributor to the National Review, was a grandson of the author of "Leo X." R. H. Hutton, a brother-in-law, issued a memoir.

Byrom's Shorthand.

Dr. John Byrom, the Jacobite poet, and inventor of a system of shorthand, was a native of Broughton, Manchester. Some years after his death there appeared "Universal English Shorthand" (1767) and "Miscellaneous Poems" (1773).

Mrs. Hemans and the Chorley Brothers.

Mrs. Hemans, who holds her place in the affections of the public by certain little lyrics which are to be found in every school collection, and for a gracious, winning nature to which Sir Walter Scott paid a magnificent tribute, was a native of Liverpool. Her "Memoirs" (1836) were written by Henry Fothergill Chorley, an able but embittered critic. Chorley enjoyed the friendship of Dickens; his elder brother, John Rutter Chorley, secretary of the Liverpool and Birmingham Railway, must have had still rarer qualities of mind and heart, inasmuch as he called forth the appreciation of Carlyle. "I know no man in these flimsy days (present days are always flimsy days) . . . so widely and correctly informed," was Carlyle's tribute; fine words despite their qualification.

De Quincey and the Broughs.

De Quincey, the graceful essayist, was born in Manchester. In his Autobiography he speaks of "the inexhaustible admiration" which he cherished "for the moral qualities, unrivalled energy and perseverance of the Lancashire people." Robert Brough passed his early manhood in the county. He edited the Liverpool Lion, wrote prose and verse for The Train and Household Words. His brother Lionel, of amiable memory, worked nobly for the Cotton Famine Fund, and introduced us to the joy of our youth, the spectral illusion called "Pepper's Ghost" (1863).

Mrs. Gaskell's Great Biography.

Mrs. Gaskell was born in Chelsea, but passed the eventful years of her life in Manchester. She has cast imperishable lustre upon Lancashire literature by her "Mary Barton" (1848) and other novels, and by her life of Charlotte Brontë (1857).

The Martineaus.

The encyclopædias notwithstanding, we have slender claims upon the honour surrounding the names of either Harriet Martineau or her brother, James Martineau, who were of Huguenot descent, though we should love to treasure both as of our truest stock.

Lancashire Novelists.

William Harrison Ainsworth, author of "Rookwood" and about thirty other enormously successful stories, took infinite pleasure in the title of "The Lancashire Novelist," conferred upon him at a complimentary dinner at Manchester, September 15th 1881, when the guests included Silas K. Hocking, author of "Smoking Flax," etc., Mrs. George Linnæus Banks, author of "The Manchester Man," and Miss Jessie Fothergill, author of "The First Violin." Reference should be made to "Ainsworth and his Friends" (2 vols., 1911).

Another famous novelist was born at Manchester—Mr. Nathaniel Gould, the author of about 120 novels dealing chiefly with the turf.

Arthur Bright, Ireland, and Axon.

Henry Arthur Bright, a Liverpool merchant, beloved of the first Lord Houghton, conveyed no slight measure of the glamour of the earth and the sunshine of flowers to his "Year in a Lancashire Garden" (1879). Alexander Ireland, was a friend of Emerson, and of Chambers, of "Vestiges of Creation" fame. Ireland was the author of "The Book Lover's Enchiridion" (1882) and an admirable volume on Hazlitt (1889). His wife, Mrs. Annie Ireland, was the biographer of Jane Welsh Carlyle (1891). W. E. A. Axon, librarian by training, journalist by selection, author, poet, and idealist by choice, wrote "Gleanings" and "Echoes" of Lancashire.

"That Lass o' Lowrie's" and "Dorrie."

Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, though she left the county in her seventeenth year, has given us, in "That Lass o' Lowrie's" (1877), probably the best short story to which Lancashire scene and character have given rise. William Tirebuck, who in conversation revealed a charm he never wholly succeeded in transferring to the printed page, was the author of "Dorrie" (1891), a powerful, but sombre story, with a Liverpool setting. I remember, with pleasure, that Tolstoy was impressed with Tirebuck's work. The pity is, he never lived to realise his high ideals.

Studies of Ancient Faith.

Dr. Thomas Inman, physician to the Royal Infirmary, Liverpool, was the author of "Ancient Faiths embodied in Ancient Names: or, an attempt to trace the Religious Belief, Sacred Rites and Holy Emblems of Certain Nations" (vol. i., 789 pp., 1868; vol. ii., 1028 pp., 1869) and other books of like character containing much original scholarship but lamentably lacking in orderly presentment—an astonishing defect in a man of scientific attainments. Dr. Inman enjoys the distinction of being, perhaps, the only Lancashire author whose books are as saleable in New York, or San Francisco, as in Liverpool, or Manchester, and at prices, too, in advance of the terms on publication, though in the interval many authors, of less original mind, have gathered sheaves from his rich fields and housed the harvest for their own.

Reminiscences of the Rossettis.

On Plutarch's plea, so aptly quoted by Boswell, that "very often an action of small note, a short saying, or a jest, distinguishes a person's real character" more than an important battle, my late sister, Lily Hall Caine, a native of Liverpool, published a sketch of her "Child's Reminiscences of Rossetti." My sister was puzzled, rather than pleased, when the trifles of a little girl's memories of the great poet and painter passed into the scrutiny of the literary laboratory.

Mr. Mackenzie Bell, also a Lancastrian, is the author of "Christina Rossetti, a biographical and critical study" (1898).

Great Poets of Prose and Verse.

At one time both Ruskin and Tennyson were Lancastrians by settlement, Ruskin living at Brantwood and Tennyson at Tent House, both on the eastern bank of Coniston Lake. Arthur Hugh Clough, whose life and work reveal the spiritual unrest of his age, was a native of Liverpool. Sir William Watson passed the years of early manhood in south-west Lancashire, and his early books bear a Liverpool imprint.

Francis Thompson was born at Preston. At Owens College, Manchester, he sought to qualify himself as a doctor. Drifting to London, he had to face a bitter struggle for bread. Recognition came tardily, though he wrote unique things that are now admitted to "make for immortality." "Since Gabriel's 'Blessed Damozel' no mystical words have so touched me as 'The Hound of Heaven,'" said Burne-Jones. One of "the very few great odes of which the language can boast," was the tribute of Coventry Patmore.

Thompson died in 1907. A collected edition edited by the poet's literary executor, Mr. Wilfrid Meynell, with portrait by the Hon. Neville Lytton, was published in 1913.

Books Dealing with China.

China occupies a large place in the commercial life of Manchester and Liverpool, particularly in the textile trade of the first-named city. Mr. Edward Harper Parker, who was educated at a school conducted by the Rev. John Brunner (father of the present Right Hon. Sir John T. Brunner, Bart.), at Everton, and the Royal Institution School, Liverpool, is Professor of Chinese in Manchester, and Reader in Liverpool. He is the author of an entire library of works relating to China: travel, history, ethnology, philology, religion, statistics and law. I never turn to Prof. Parker's "Studies in Chinese Religion" (1910)—which includes the article, "Chinese Blessedness," he contributed to Hastings' "Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics"—without illumination.

Writers in the Dialect.

Edwin Waugh, author of "Come whoam to thi childer an' me," sustained the best traditions of Lancashire as a writer in the dialect. To a later generation of readers, Waugh's reputation suffers from the over-conscientious zeal of men who were attached to a most likeable man. Waugh's genius, however, was not of that order that it can continue to sustain the strain of a collected edition in ten volumes (1881-90). A saner tribute would be a gathering of the best, and a judicious forgetting of the remainder. What Alexander Ireland did for Hazlitt, a new Lancashire author, of equal sympathy and discrimination, should do for Waugh. The same criticism applies with equal force to the work of Samuel Laycock, and also to that of Ben Brierley, who issued for some years, with great acceptance, a bright weekly miscellany, called Ben Brierley's Journal, wherein the dialect was never wholly absent.

In a similar field, Mr. Allen Clarke, otherwise known as "Teddy Ashton," author of "Windmill Land" (1916), and various dialect sketches of Lancashire lads and lasses, has attained high favour. The names of Messrs. Fred Plant (Stockport), William Baron (Rochdale), Ammon Wrigley (Delph, near Oldham), Joseph Baron (Blackburn), and Langford Saunders (Eccles), must be included in any list of honourable mention for authorship in the domain of the terse folk speech of the county.

The Lancashire Authors' Association.

All these, I believe, are connected with the Lancashire Authors' Association (instituted in 1909). This organisation is doing a laudable work in banding together members of the writing fraternity, working, or residing within, and interested in the literary concerns of the county. That such a body should exist—no other county in England can make a like claim—is a glowing tribute to the interest in native literature, and the growing dignity of the profession of letters.

Compilations.

George Bradshaw, of railway time-table fame, was a native of Pendleton. Apprenticed to an engraver, the idea occurred to him to issue several maps of our inland waterways (1830)—steam packets first plied on the canals in 1812—and some years later a similar presentment of our newly established iron roadways (1838). Bradshaw's Railway Time Tables first appeared in 1839; in 1840 the title was changed to Companion; and in December, 1841, the Guide was introduced. A kindred issue, Bradshaw's Railway Manual and Shareholders' Guide, beginning 1848, affords a fund of material relating to the rapid development of the railway systems of the world.

Grocott's "Index to Familiar Quotations from British Authors" was first published in Liverpool (1854), where the compiler, John C. Grocott, held the post of registrar to the ancient borough court.

New Features in Journalism.

Lancashire was the place of origin of a type of journal that has had a marked influence upon the current of popular reading, even on the character and contents of many of our daily newspapers of large circulation. Tit Bits began its course in Manchester under the editorship of George Newnes (afterwards Sir George Newnes, Bart.). Sir Arthur Pearson's right-hand man in the production of Pearson's Weekly, Pearson's Magazine, Home Notes, and allied publications, was Peter Keary, a native of Liverpool. Mr. Robert Leighton, who has established an enduring reputation as a writer of boys' books, was formerly connected with the Liverpool Porcupine (a social and satirical journal founded by Hugh Shimmin, a Manxman); was thereafter for some years a Director of Answers, and part-author of much sensational fiction appearing in the pages of Lord Northcliffe's first journal.

Mr. Louis Tracy, author of "The Final War" (1896) and many other popular books, mostly fiction, a journalist by training and connected at one time with the Sun and Evening News of London, is a native of Liverpool.

The genius of the late W. F. Tillotson, of Bolton, found expression in two important directions. His name is identified with the Tillotson Newspaper Syndicate, which he formed for publishing simultaneously, in various newspapers throughout the world, original works of fiction by great authors. He also gave to his native town one of the first, if not the first, daily halfpenny evening journals in the country—the Bolton Evening News—before Manchester or London possessed such a paper.

The Artisan's Sunday Reading.

The Sunday Chronicle, of Manchester, established itself in public favour by the vigour and daring of a small group of able writers, of whom "Nunquam," the pen-name of Mr. Robert Blatchford, author of that cynically named book, "Merrie England," remains the livest and most conspicuous figure. Many other Sunday newspapers have appeared, and many old-established weekly newspapers have succumbed to the competition, while others have altered their appearance and policy, in order to conform to public demands.

To shut one's eyes to the success of the large number of weekly newspapers now issued for Sunday reading—nearly all of them have a large circulation among the working classes of the big towns of Lancashire—is to wilfully obscure one's vision to signs and portents.

Chronicles of Sport.

Horse-racing and athletics (particularly football) obtain a large amount of space in the newspapers of Lancashire—morning, evening, and weekly. On Saturday nights there are special issues of the evening newspapers entirely devoted to sport. And it is a fact not without its national significance, Our Dogs is a Manchester publication.

To follow the many important newspaper developments that have been evolved from these successes (wherein Lancashire has taken so definite a lead), is to trace the history of modern journalism.

The Real Leaders of Lancashire.

No glance at the influences which have moulded the mind of modern Lancashire can be complete in its survey that does not include the two leading journalists of the two principal cities.

In Liverpool, Sir Edward Richard Russell, of the Liverpool Daily Post (now the Liverpool Post and Mercury) since 1860, editor since 1869, has been an unfailing inspiration to the intellectual life of South-west Lancashire for more than half a century, and though the strenuous competitive elements of politics have claimed a share of his attentions, there has never been a trace of any bitterness; over all his activities he has cast the gracious spell of scholarship and good nature. In Liverpool everyone is full of his praise; the passage of time has produced only one change: it has converted esteem into a degree of affection bordering on love. Worries strew the path of the editor of a daily newspaper. Sir Edward Russell has been most happily served in being saved many of these trials of labour and patience by his colleague, Mr. Hugh Farrie, who has given to journalism what authorship, at one time, seemed destined to claim as her own.

Mr. Charles Prestwich Scott, the governing director of the Manchester Guardian, since 1872, has held a position of immense influence and responsibility in the life of the sister city, shaping in no small degree the general drift of "What Lancashire thinks to-day——." Mr. Scott is in earnest. He is a man of firm convictions and splendid courage, coupled with a loyalty that is never under the influence of short views or commercial limitations. He is the first asset in the proverbial sanity of Lancashire.

Disraeli, Dickens, Longfellow, and others.

Benjamin Disraeli had his Lancashire types thrust upon him—Sir Robert Peel, Gladstone, etc. They certainly wanted no seeking in the age in which he lived. Disraeli's fiction suffers badly from age; the sparkle has gone.

Dickens came thence for the "Cheeryble Brothers" of "Nicholas Nickleby" (1838-1839). In real life the Brothers Cheeryble were the partners of the firm of William Grant & Co., cotton spinners and calico printers, of Bury, Ramsbottom, and Manchester. What is not so well known, however, is that there is some ground for supposing that Dickens caught his first impulse in the characterisation of "Tim Linkwater" on hearing various quaint details of the Grants' old clerk, Thomas Richardson. Even the blind blackbird that "dreamed and dozed away his days" had a counterpart in the firm's office.

When the last of the Grant brothers died in 1855, a Manchester newspaper chronicled the fact in these words:—"Deceased (John) and his late brother

Wm. were extensively known for their kindly disposition and munificent charities which Dickens has attempted to delineate in his not unsuccessful sketch of 'Cheeryble Brothers.'" I can imagine no one but a Manxman so appreciative of the dead, and yet withal so scrupulously cautious in his qualifications and niggardly in his praise of the living.

In "The Courtship of Myles Standish," Longfellow has signally helped to immortalize a great Lancastrian. Myles Standish was born at Duxbury, about 1584, and sailed with the Mayflower in 1620. He attained imperishable fame, by his courage and resources while military head of the new English colony, established in Massachusetts.

Lancashire is in many modern novels; sometimes it is no more than a striking incident drawn from our history; sometimes it is the whole framework, a series of remarkable episodes drawn from the life of one individual. He who runs may read; I dare not hazard the risk of any names.

Private Libraries.

The best private library in Lancashire is probably that of the Earl of Crawford, at Haigh Hall, near Wigan; the libraries of the Earl of Derby, at Knowsley, near Prescot, and the Earl of Sefton, at Croxteth Hall, near Liverpool, are rich only in muniments and deeds.

Scientists.

Joseph Priestly, the chemist (sometimes called "the father of pneumatic chemistry") and Rationalist, began his literary career at Warrington. He died in exile in 1804; but statues are now erected to the honour of this fearless champion of truth.

John Dalton is included in Lonsdale's "Cumberland Worthies," but it was in Manchester that he evolved his Atomic Theory. Professor Roscoe has a fine tribute in "Science Lectures for the People" (1874, pp. 152-164), ending with this urgent plea:—"Science must be free . . . free, above all, to speculate and theorise into regions far beyond the reach of our senses."

William Henry, the chemist, to whom, with Dalton, the honour is due for the high scientific value attaching to the Memoirs of the Manchester Society.

Sir Wm. Fairbairn, famed for bridge construction and important developments in the use of iron in the construction of ships, was a Kelso man. Not till he commenced business in Old Street, Manchester, however, did Fairbairn set out seriously on his great career as an engineer.

Eaton Hodgkinson was a contemporary and colleague of Fairbairn. Hodgkinson was responsible for most important experiments and calculations.

Dr. William Whewell, born at Lancaster, had a master mind for any craft, calling, or profession, from mineralogy and theology to Chinese music. "Science was his chief forte; omniscience his foible."

Sir Joseph Whitworth, famed for the manufacture of engineering tools, rifles, and rifled artillery, and the invention of "the Whitworth process," was born at Stockport, but laid the foundation of his reputation in the workshops or Manchester.

Sir Richard Owen, the author of famous works on Comparative Anatomy and Palæontology, was born at Lancaster.

James Prescott Joule, whose name is preserved in the term, "Joule's equivalent," meaning the unit of work in practical electricity, was a native of Salford. He died at Sale in 1889.

Sir Henry Roscoe has been already referred to.

Sir Edward Thorpe, Roscoe's biographer, and author of "A Dictionary of Applied Chemistry," five vols., is a native of Manchester.

The present Lord Mayor of Liverpool (Mr. Max Muspratt), comes of a family of chemists. His grandfather, James Muspratt (1793-1886), introduced the alkali industry into Lancashire His uncle, James Sheridan Muspratt, was then editor of Muspratt's "Dictionary of Chemistry." And, as a proof of heredity, it may be mentioned that the Lord Mayor has been conspicuous for his devotion to chemical study as a vocation, to the theatre as a guest.

The list might be largely extended by drawing upon the great names identified with divinity, medicine, surgery, manufacture, and trade. I am in danger, however, of wearying the reader with a compilation approximating to a mere catalogue.

Great Names in Art: Romney.

The greatest name is that of George Romney, who was born at Dalton in 1734. "Reynolds and Romney divide the Town: I am of the Romney faction," said Lord Thurlow. In one year Romney made nearly £4,000 by painting portraits. For his "Bacchante" (Emma, Lady Hamilton) he was paid 50 guineas, or about one-fifth of what a brilliant impression of the print in colours would fetch to-day. After thirty-five years the painter, now "old, nearly mad, and quite desolate," returned to his wife at Kendal, and she, with amazing forgiveness, received back the wanderer, nursing him till his death. "This quiet act was worth all Romney's pictures," says Edward Fitzgerald. Tennyson tells the tale in "Romney's Remorse."

Sir Luke Fildes, R.A.

"The Doctor" (1892) is, probably, the most famous work of a Lancashire painter of modern times. Sir Luke Fildes, was a student of the Warrington School of Art; the painting was the commission of a Lancashire man, Sir Henry Tate. Warrington is also the home school of Mr. Henry Wood, R.A., the painter of some of the most exquisite studies of Venice within the realm of modern art.

Stott, Madox Brown, Shields, and Sheffield.

William Stott, of Oldham, has left an enduring reputation as a landscape artist. Manchester gave a welcome to Ford Madox Brown, who painted the frescoes which decorate the Town Hall; to Frederick Shields, the painter and decorative artist, whose best work is to be seen on the walls of the Chapel of the Ascension, Bayswater Road, London; to George Sheffield, whose chosen medium was charcoal; and many, many more.

The Painter of Firelight Scenes.

William Daniels sheds lustre on the fame of Liverpool. He was born on May 9th, 1813, the son of parents who wrought in the brickfields along the North Shore. His first modelling in clay was so remarkable as to arrest the attention of a wood engraver, by whom he was employed for seven years. But Daniels' ambition was to paint portraits, and his first conspicuous effort was a painting of a pretty girl, Mary Owens, his fiancée. Twice he painted "Gold Fish," the first showing a child looking at the gleaming swimmers; in the second the child is displaced in favour of the flashing eyes of a black cat. Robert Crompton, the artist's friend, relates a story of the latter picture. It was first shown in Liverpool in 1876, and the hanging committee, having, as usual, no notion of the distinction of a great work of art, treated it according to their appraisement of its value. Daniels is often associated with the Rembrandt school. He was at his best in candle and firelight scenes. He died October 13th, 1880. The fame of this great artist has hitherto eluded the attention of the editors of some of our best known works of reference.

William Lindsay Windus was probably the nearest approach to inspired genius that Liverpool has, thus far, produced. He received his first lesson in painting from Daniels. His best known picture is " Burd Helen " (1856). It was in the Royal Academy, badly hung, of course. But Rossetti discovered it, and he brought Ruskin to see it and share his enthusiasm. In the judgment of Ruskin " its aim was higher and its reserve strength greater " than any other work in the Exhibition of that year, Millais' "Autumn Leaves " alone excepted. Bitter disappointment followed in the wake of this triumph. " Too Late " (1859), which the artist regarded as his masterpiece, was practically despised by Ruskin. The painter was cut to the quick and speedily retired from the public gaze.

The Painter of American Naval History.

Bolton was the birthplace of Edward Moran (born 1829), who is described as " the greatest marine painter of the United States," his fame chiefly resting on a series of thirteen historical paintings, illustrative of American naval history. He died in New York City in 1901. His paintings of the Grand Cañon are remarkable for their colouring and vivid realism.

Huggins, Finnie, and others.

William Huggins was probably the finest animal draughtsman of his era ; better than Landseer ; in colouring lay his deficiency. (The well-known chart of " The History of Architecture," 1863, was the work of his brother, Samuel Huggins.) The passing of John Finnie, etcher and painter, still leaves a vacant niche in every Liverpool Exhibition. Landscapes by Mr. George Cockran and Mr. Alfred Hartland have been acquired by the nation. Presentation portraits have been, as a rule, the work of Mr. R. E. Morrison or Mr. Hall Neale.

Sculpture.

Mr. Bruce Joy is represented by sculpture in Barrow-in-Furness, Blackburn, Manchester, and Liverpool ; Sir George Frampton in Southport, St. Helens, and Liverpool.

Patrons and Painters.

George Rae, the banker, Frederick Leyland, the shipowner, were conspicuous patrons of art, their choice being Whistler, Rossetti, and Burne Jones. The Agnews, Manchester men, have always found Lancashire a generous field. A good year in cotton and shipping has never failed to produce an eager response to the calls of art. There is, as a consequence, a fair showing of artistic treasure on the walls of Lancashire homes ; but as rich buyers drop out of the active pursuit of business, they often drift to London as a place of residence. In this way, Lancashire suffers a never-ending loss. No painter of merit, however, need languish in want or obscurity. If the rich patron, chiefly of those artists who have come to their own, removes to London, his absence is no loss to genius in the making. Many painters of only modest promise can testify that, in the pursuit of their studies, long visits to France and Italy become possible only by the substantial aid of well-to-do lovers of art. Lancashire, therefore, is not wholly wrapt up in the mysteries of money-making, as Londoners so fondly imagine ; she has good and wide uses for money made.

Nearly every centre of population has its Art Gallery. Certain of the municipal collections are second only to those of the nation, though we have been buyers for hardly more than half a century.

An Apostle of Beauty.

Art Galleries, however, have not solely created their own public. There have been " feeders " without. No man has done more to lure the public to an appreciation of the great masterpieces of art than Mr. Joseph Bibby, of Liverpool. Year after year he has familiarised our farming folk with the world's choicest gifts in art, whilst Bibby's Annual is never less than a feast of colour and a fountain of thought. Beauty is an integral part of his religion of life, and, in the counting of noble agencies for good, he must be remembered among the most worthy of our land.

A Suggestion to Collectors.

To realise what has been done in the creation of the artistic sense, some one, for the sake of posterity, and before it is too late, should make a collection of the dreadful prints beloved by the people, up to, say, the mid-Victorian era; those treasures of a bygone generation, and findable now only among the semi-waste heaps of the lowest class of auction-room, and the humblest of second-hand furniture stores.

I recall one of these prints representing the bodily resurrection—a cemetery scene—broken pillars and tombstones falling about like ninepins, the dead rising from their long sleep and smashing coffin lids in a frenzied effort to extricate themselves at the sounding of "The Last Trump." Truly a work worthy of inclusion in any waxwork Chamber of Horrors. There were many such; but all are gone—and gone, I feel sure, for ever.

The Pride of Lancashire in Stone.

St. George's Hall, Liverpool, is probably the finest example of Græco-Roman architecture in the kingdom.

"There is little ornamentation about the exterior, yet what a wonderful effect has been produced by the simple use of reiterated long lines, vertical and horizontal! All the attributes of justice, rectitude, dignity, truth, uprightness, impartial aloofness and wide capacity are typified by a style so perfectly expressive and pure that it at once conveys to the eye an interpretation of the use of the structure" (James Bromley, in the Liverpool Post and Mercury, February 27th, 1911).

Unhappily, the Corporation have shown scant intelligence in the preservation of the view of the fabric left to their charge. They have allowed statues to be erected in front of the hall, though well knowing that the architect had provided pedestals for these in the colonnade between the pilasters. While the pedestals remain tenantless, the statues erected in front of the hall are not only a distraction to the eye—they are, with the possible exception of that of General Earle, lifeless things in themselves.

The architect of the St. George's Hall was Harvey Lonsdale Elmes. He was the son of an architect, and died at the age of thirty-four, in 1847, before the great palace that has conferred immortality upon his name was completed. (The father, James Elmes, survived his son fifteen years, dying in 1862.) The commission to finish the work passed to Professor Charles Robert Cockerell, R.A. (died 1863). The difference between genius and mere talent is nowhere more evident. All the interior, and inferior work is Cockerell's. I must not forget, however, to bear testimony to the really fine sculpture in the tympanum of the pediment of the south elevation. This was Cockerell's unaccepted designs for the Royal Exchange in London. I have not been able to trace the name of the sculptor, to whom high praise is also due.

One other specimen of the inspired Elmes is in Liverpool, viz. the College in Shaw Street. As an example of pure Tudor style, it suffers only from the parsimony of the powers of the period, in substituting cheap materials, and not providing a more elevated site, and a setting well back from the street.

A Landmark in Architectural History.

Following upon this great work, or within a period rather more than half a century, Liverpool architects and civil engineers have attained a position of world-wide pre-eminence.

Alfred Waterhouse, R.A., the architect of the Assize Courts, Town Hall, and Owens College, Manchester; Girton College, Cambridge; the Natural History Museum, South Kensington; Eaton Hall, Cheshire; Heythrop, Oxfordshire; and Iwerne Minster, Dorsetshire, was a native of Liverpool. There may be, and no doubt is, a great sameness in the work of Waterhouse. His hand may be recognised at a glance. All the same, his name is a landmark in modern architectural history, if only for the important tasks that fell to his lot.

A Great Cathedral.

Another youthful and inspired poet in stone, fit companion for Elmes, is Gilbert Scott, the architect of the new Cathedral. He, also, is the son of an architect, Sir George Gilbert Scott (died 1878), whose "restoration" work produced more than one fierce controversy. As to the designs of the son for the great work upon which he is now engaged, there is, happily, but one voice. The new Cathedral promises to be the most impressive ecclesiastical structure erected in England for several hundred years. The style may be described as severe early Gothic, depending for its impressiveness upon simplicity, and massiveness of detail.

Coming in from the Sea.

Coming into Liverpool from the sea, the two most conspicuous buildings are the head-quarters of the Royal Liver Friendly Society, and the offices of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. Neither can escape observation or mention; both are of recent construction. The architect of the former was Mr. W. Aubrey Thomas; the architects of the latter, Messrs. Briggs, Wolstenholme and Thorneley, who also planned the Wallasey Town Hall, and a considerable part of the University.

Architecture and Town Planning.

The importance of the school of learning which Liverpool has developed in two departments of intellectual activity—architecture and town planning—is not easily exaggerated. There are professors of architecture and civic design, also of engineering, electrical and civil, in the University. But it is to the School of Town Planning, founded by Sir William Lever, Bart. (now Lord Leverhulme), in the building of the Old Blue-Coat Hospital (the best specimen and the only antique relic of Georgian architecture left in the city), that Liverpool owes its fame and pre-eminence. One of the pupils, a youth named Mawson, has been selected architect for the extension of Athens. He is now building, to the commission of Lord Leverhulme, a replica (on about a quarter scale) of Liverpool Castle, on an elevated site overlooking Rivington Lake. Apart from the garden town of Port Sunlight, where he employed several architects to carry out his own original ideas, the styles being principally Queen Anne and half-timbered, essentially English, it is only justice to say that Lord Leverhulme has done more to foster art than any other single individual, living or dead, in the whole county, though our obligations to the late Sir Henry Tate, Sir Andrew Walker, and Hugh Frederick Hornby, are manifest, and acknowledged of all.

Liverpool's Pre-eminence.

Liverpool men have not only largely re-planned and re-decorated their own city, they have displayed their skill in every quarter of the globe. To Mr. J. A. Brodie, the City Engineer, was entrusted the re-planning of Delhi, the new imperial capital of India. Messrs. Simon and Boddington are the architects of the new Houses of Parliament at Winnipeg, Canada. In the Marquis of Aberdeen's competitions for the re-planning of Dublin, not only was the prize awarded to the designs submitted by Professor Patrick Abercrombie of the Department of Civic Design, Liverpool, and Messrs. Sidney A. and Arthur J. Kelly, Surveyors, Liverpool, but three, of the remaining seven sets of designs, singled out for honourable mention, came from the studios of Liverpool firms. In truth, the world must as necessarily come to Liverpool for an architectural design, or a town-plan, as to Manchester for cotton cloth.

Lancashire on the Stage.

Thomas Heywood, described by Charles Lamb as " a prose Shakespeare," and by J. Addington Symonds as sharing, with Richard Greene, the distinction of being " among the earliest professional litterateurs of our language," produced, in collaboration with Richard Brome, a play entitled," The Late Lancashire Witches " (1634). It is a comedy of English life, " without that element of romantic interest which Heywood usually added to the domestic drama. . . . Though it attempts, in one scene at least, to touch the deeper interest of witchcraft, it deals for the most part only with the vulgar and farcical aspects of the subject " (Symonds, 1888). J. O. Halliwell-Phillips brought the play out of oblivion by a separate publication (1853). One of the most gracious memories of my youth is a visit to Hollingbury Copse, near Brighton, the home of Halliwell-Phillips. A treasured possession is a copy of " Outlines of the Life of Shakespeare " with the author's words of gift.

" The Slave King."

About the middle of the last century a Negro actor, named Ira Aldridge, attained considerable fame in Lancashire. George Linnæus Banks (1821-1881) wrote for him a play, called " The Slave King." Banks wrote other plays during his " Lancashire period," notably, " The Swiss Father," in which Creswick took a leading part.

Bob Brierly.

" The Lancashire Lad " was, I believe, the provisional title of one of the most famous plays of the mid-Victorian era. " The Yellow Passport " would have been a translation of the French, but these words had no meaning for an English audience. Finally, " The Ticket of Leave Man " was adopted as a title, and under this name the piece achieved a remarkable success. It was not only Tom Taylor's best play, it incorporated the fullest and most acceptable presentment of a Lancashire type, thus far seen on the stage. And yet, curiously enough, the piece was based—" adopted " would convey a false impression of a task to which so much original thought and observation had been given—on a foreign work, viz., " Le Retour de Melun " of Brisebarre and Nuz. Henry Nevile portrayed the part of Bob Brierly, at the original production at the Olympic Theatre, on the 27th May, 1863, and achieved immense fame thereby.

" The Lancashire Lass."

Henry James Byron, the first editor of Fun, was born in Manchester. Tom Taylor's great success prompted him to a rival effort ; surely a Lancastrian should know the riches of his own county ! A melodrama, called " The Lancashire Lass," was produced in the following year at a neighbouring theatre, where it had the support of a strong caste and an abundant financial backing. The piece is included in French's plays. Byron has the merit of introducing to his Fun constituency such humorists as Sir W. S. Gilbert, Sir Francis Burnand, Henry S. Leigh and W. J. Prowse.

A Gifted and Versatile Dramatist.

Sydney Grundy was the son of a Mayor of Manchester, and was himself born and educated in Manchester. Here also he began his career as a practising barrister. His versatility was bewildering. When he came to London he devoted himself to writing for the stage, and within a few years he had produced "La Cosaque," a vaudeville from the French, two original comic operas, entitled "The Vicar of Bray" and "Pocahontas," "Rachel," a drama for Miss Geneviève Ward, and three comedies, "The Queen's Favourite," "The Glass of Fashion," and "The Silver Shield." Not, however, till "A Pair of Spectacles" (1890), and "Sowing the Wind" (1893), stood to his name, did we realise the full strength of the dramatist's powers—the delicacy of his wit, the deep well of pathos he might plumb.

In "A Pair of Spectacles" Sir John Hare, who began his stage career at the Prince of Wales Theatre, Liverpool, found, probably, his best remembered part. In "Sowing the Wind," Brandon Thomas, a native of Liverpool and author of "The Lancashire Sailor" (1891) and "Charley's Aunt" (1892), was a revelation of mingled humour and pathos. I am not sure if Grundy escaped writing one of the best half-dozen plays of the nineteenth century.

Lord Dundreary.

Edward Askew Sothern (1830–1881), who as Lord Dundreary in Tom Taylor's play, "Our American Cousin" (1858), was the delight of our fathers' playgoing prime, was a native of Liverpool. He was intended by his parents for Holy Orders, but his own bent, despite bitter obstacles, was for the stage. We are prone to assume that Sothern's scope as an actor had marked limitations; forgetting that the limitation is with us, rather than with the actor; our acceptance of him rather his deficiency.

Stage History.

It is not my purpose, however, to recall even a selection of the plays that were Lancastrian by scene; let alone, detail that catalogue of plays, that were Lancastrian only by birth, i.e. place of first production, or that still more formidable list of actors and actresses who were, or, happily, are, Lancastrian by birth, or by the process of adoption, in vogue under the stock company system.

Many of us make remembrance of the fact that the T. W. Robertson series of tea-cup-and-saucer dramas began their course in Liverpool, with the presentment of "Society"; that Irving earned his preferment to London by his performance of "Faust," in Manchester; that the Mephistophelian line that is now an accepted feature of the classic drama, "I only knew one woman who refused diamonds, and she accepted money," was first spoken in Manchester; and that —— (naming a great actor) began his theatrical career as check taker at the gallery entrance of the old Royal Amphitheatre, Liverpool.

These scraps of stage history are the flotsam and jetsam of every green room. They may be true. I cannot say. I hardly care to inquire.

Dead Emotions.

If it be true that there is nothing so desolating of heart, as a theatre, in the pale morning light of a winter sun, there is nothing so dead, as dead emotions—the laughter and the tears of the crowded house of yestereen. For pathos, I know nothing to compare with the old chronicles of the stage. The sound and fury signifying nothing, are all spent; the eye, with its sparkle and cunning shaft, that proved our delight, is heavy and dull; the voice that thrilled us with its appeal, is silent and done. Of great nights at the play, what have we, wherewithal to re-kindle old enthusiasm? A memory, like a wine cup that is drained; an old playbill, so crumpled and decayed in every visible feature, that it suggests the stale musty odour of a corpse.

I leave the reader to conjure up, if so minded, the ghosts of his own early manhood. My names are only so many stones, marking the spot where dry bones are resting, the bygone idols of a bygone generation.

My concern here is with the playgoers, rather than with the players. Let no historian of the growth of our mental faculties suppose, that when we were busy making Lancashire, we were all such giants of intellect, that our nights of ease were feasts of soul. Let us make confession that we oft-times found our joy in a kind of half-way house, a something between a village concert and the drama of the stage.

Sam Hague's Minstrels.

For instance, all Lancashire found refreshment in Sam Hague's Minstrels. The supposition was, that this species of entertainment had its origin among the emancipated slaves of the cotton plantations of America. The " troupe " (it was always proper to speak of the company as a troupe) occupied chairs, ranged on the stage, in the form of a horse-shoe. A chairman sat at a little table Up Stage Centre, and the chief comedians scored off each other from the furthermost points—P. and O.P. All faces were black, all linen, of which there was a plentiful display, was faultlessly white. The Negro-English speech of the cotton-fields was an invariable rule. Songs, stories, supposedly impromptu speeches, humorous asides and dances to the click of bones, filled the bill. For years and years, we had gush and sentiment to overflowing. It was all false as inherent fact, and not much of it true, even to the most superficial observation. The real Negro was never visible. The ancient chants, of an ancient race, were never heard. The real dances, whether Bella-Bella, Jumbi, Obeah, Voudou, or T'changa, were never seen—or even suspected. All we got was the white man masquerading behind a coating of burnt cork. Amusing? Undoubtedly so, particularly to those whose puritanical consciences stayed abruptly at a regular theatre. Then we tired—tired even of the melodies, which languorous, sun-kissed lands had inspired. The white man, with a black face, had fallen from grace. He was seen no more.

" Begone Dull Care."

Then there was Fred McCabe, who initiated a form of entertainment which he made peculiarly his own. " Begone Dull Care " was only a play in the sense that it had a setting, that the performance took place on a stage, that there was dialogue, and, therefore, more than one performer. McCabe, however, was the play; the remainder of the caste " fed " their chief and formed a mere background for his wit and song. I am told by my neighbour, Mr. John H. Wrangham, who has a prodigious memory for all details of the modern stage, that McCabe was a native of Bootle. Certainly no entertainer knew his Lancastrian public better. He could keep an audience wreathed in smiles, with no other aid than playful asides that were the language of the street, and a penny tin whistle that was the music of the curb. His end was the unkindly fate of so many of his kind.

" Fritz."

But, among one man shows, all lights pale in the effulgence that surrounds the memory of J. K. Emmett. As " Fritz," in a play of that name, he spoke the broken English of a Dutchman, very much after the manner of Charles Godfrey Leland's amazingly clever " Breitmann Ballads." He is described to me as one of the greatest actors who ever walked the English stage. I make discount. As Dutton Cook used to say, " The palmy days of the drama are all yesterdays." That " Fritz " could make people laugh and cry, is only one of many tributes to his unique genius. Playing to the Fiji Islanders, an audience practically ignorant of every word of his vocabulary, and so unused to the resources of civilisation, that each paid admission by bulky gifts from his garden patch, Emmett quickly had the emotions of every listener in his keeping.

"I first get every man into touch with me—at the end of an invisible electric wire so to speak," said Emmett in explanation of his mystery; "the rest is child's play."

The proof was in the result; Emmett's art withstood every test; the black man rocked and rolled in uncontrollable merriment, without always knowing how, or why. But, sad to say, Emmett shamefully abused his transcendent gifts. It was no unusual thing for a house, packed, eager and expectant, to go empty away. And yet, it is not too much to say, that in theatre-loving Lancashire his memory remains with many, a precious legacy of laughter and tears, sadness and song.

Repertory Theatres.

The briefest glance at the history of the drama in Lancashire must include a reference to the splendid work of the Repertory Theatres of Manchester and Liverpool. Both these enterprises have afforded an opportunity for untried writers, among whom the late Stanley Houghton (the author of "Hindle Wakes"), Jeans, and Harold Brighouse ("Hobson's Choice") call for special mention.

The merit of "Hindle Wakes" lay in its scrupulously exact chracterisation, and the note of surprise with which the play closed. The demerits were along the same path—a characterisation that depended so largely for its atmosphere, upon folk speech that was jargon out of Lancashire, and a surprise that destroyed the original drift of the play, i.e. the regularisation of the love and passion of two people of different social positions. If there were love, the conventions insist upon marriage; if there were no love, then all we have left is an unseemly episode that has no place in the modern English drama. The significance of that ending is more important to us here than the play—the picture it presents of the mind of the audience, rather than that of the writer.

Mr. Brighouse has achieved more than one conspicuous success; he has shown powers of observation and presentment that should carry him far. I take infinite pleasure, also, in the loyalty of Manchester. Had he belonged to some communities I ken of, more markedly Celtic in temperament, he would have found every adverse word reprinted in extenso, and the slander shouted to the skies.

"The Clock Goes Round" is, I believe, the seventeenth play from the pen of Mr. Brighouse, of which five only have a Lancashire background. His appeal, therefore, is as wide as the drama should be.

Mr. John Galsworthy, the novelist, has also contributed to the Repertory Theatres, "The Silver Box" (1906) being a fitting example of the work of the practised hand.

The Repertory Theatre movement is worthy of all praise and encouragement.

Critics.

In the field of dramatic criticism, the palm of place falls to Sir Edward Russell, the veteran chief of the Liverpool Post and Mercury. Irving entertained feelings of warm affection and regard for the critic.

Austin Brereton, too, is a Liverpool man by right of birth. He has devoted his life to the literary presentment of the concerns of the stage. His historical works relating to Irving, Miss Ellen Terry, and other players of the past and present, fill a distinct niche in the literature of the stage.

"Thy Speech Bewrayeth Thee."

In an introduction to the American public of an edition of the play "Hobson's Choice," Mr. Iden Payne tells us that some critics were struck by the "practicality, hard-headedness, and self-centred aggressiveness" of Mr. Harold Brighouse's Lancashire types, and that some critics expressed surprise when told that these features were not individual to the particular parts, but were typical of the county of Lancashire as a whole.

My experience in America and elsewhere has been different. I have never found that Lancashire "hard-headedness" stood in need of introduction, tribute, or explanation anywhere. Indeed, among travelled men, the county of one's origin is almost instantly manifest. "Thy speech bewrayeth thee."

Gladstone, according to assertion, but never to my ears, retained to his dying days certain of the distinguishing sounds of the county of his birth. The instincts of the Lancastrian, however, were never far to seek, though, even in this case, confusion arises from the nature of the inheritance in his blood.

Music.

Music, as an expression of the mind as well as the heart, has slowly come to its own. Our gratitude is due to a nameless host; but, perhaps, most of all to two foreigners—Sir Charles Hallé and Carl Rosa. Rich promise of equally notable service gathers round the name of Sir Thomas Beecham, Bart., conductor, composer, and operatic impresario.

Sir Charles Hallé.

About the middle of the last century, Hallé had to leave Paris. From London he came to Manchester, and with music in this great city he was thereafter associated. His highly trained orchestra was not merely a model of efficiency, it was a revelation of balance, unity, force, and nervous susceptibility, instant in its response to the mind of a master musician.

Music was enthroned among the arts. For instance, Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust" was performed in Paris in 1846 "to a half empty room," and the composer, crushed in soul and a bankrupt in pocket, writes: "Nothing in all my artistic career ever wounded me so deeply" ("Autobiography," vol. ii., p. 256). In 1880 Hallé produced this great work in Manchester, and reversed the judgment of Paris.

Carl Rosa.

Carl August Nicholas Rose, or Rosa, initiated his Opera Company in 1875. Thereafter grand opera became a regular feature of our lives. Every year the Carl Rosa Opera Company made long stays in Liverpool and Manchester, creating a public for great music, rather than ministering to the mind of a public already existent. Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" was one of Rosa's most popular hits.

Hatton's Songs.

"To Anthea," "Simon the Cellarer," "Good-bye, Sweetheart, Good-bye," and nearly three hundred other songs came from the pen of John Liptrot Hatton, a native of Liverpool, and son and grandson of professional violinists. There was a moment when Hatton seemed destined to rank with the inspired Schubert as a writer of songs.

"Stephen Adams."

"Nancy Lee," "The Midshipmite," "The Holy City," "Mona," and "Thora" (the two last named are versifications of my brother's stage dramas

" Ben-m'-Chree " and " The Prodigal Son ") were among the greatest successes of " Stephen Adams," the pen-name of Michael Maybrick, a native of Liverpool. The composer won acceptance also in the concert hall, where, as a baritone, he was usually heard in his own songs.

W. T. Best.

W. T. Best, the greatest organist of his age, if not of any age, came to Liverpool in his youth, and remained till his death (1897). He worked four hours a day at the organ, and perfected himself in pianoforte technique. There was in Best's playing a crispness difficult to define, the suggestion of brilliance, associated with the touch of the pianoforte rather than the organ. He was a lifelong student of Handel; his Handel " Album " runs to twenty vols. His pre-eminence in his own walk of life enabled him to share Herbert Spencer's contempt of honorary degrees. He also refused a knighthood, but accepted a civil list pension of £100 per annum.

Best is spoken of as " a recluse." He was no recluse, though, it is true, he did not easily, or amiably, fraternise with members of his own profession. He was a busy man as performer, composer, editor, and teacher; to my remembrance, a little prone to cynical humour, but with tastes, in a musician, wide and generous, as a glance round his bookshelves showed.

Jude, Joule, and Pyne.

Mr. W. H. Jude, organist, song and hymn writer, and an almost unrivalled performer on the harmonium, was long associated with Liverpool. A Christmas Carol, a setting to a Gladstonian campaigning song for the General Election of 1880, and a song, " Behold, I Stand at the Door " refresh my ears.

The name of B. St. J. B. Joule, brother of the scientist, " as a writer, critic, organist, and above all, as a leader in the revival of the choral service," to quote the memorial in the Church of Holy Trinity, Hulme, calls for mention here. Manchester also justly takes pride in the name and fame of Dr. J. Kendrick Pyne, a pupil of S. S. Wesley, and organist of the Town Hall since 1877.

The list of names calling for chronicle might be almost indefinitely extended. I have space for no more.

The People at Play.

The pleasures of the people include dancing and swimming; the latter, rather curiously, chiefly in centres furthest removed from the sea-board; but dancing easily takes a first place. Probably in no other county of England, does the population number a larger proportion of men and women to whom what is called the poetry of motion comes with greater ease and naturalness. Further, among the people, it is never associated with the baser touch so frequently made visible, in what Fred McCabe described as " the uppah cucles." Indeed, among the people of Lancashire, dancing is rather a solemn affair, as anyone may see by a visit, in the season, to the palaces of Blackpool or Douglas. Solo, or clog dancing, however, has no longer the old vogue. Once it was an important turn on the music hall stage; now it has almost entirely disappeared.

The fancy for keeping pigeons and dogs has also largely lapsed from grace; but both cotton operative and collier have tastes in common—a football match for the Saturday half-holiday; a serious, blood-curdling drama at the theatre in the evening or, in the alternative, a visit to the " Pictures." The wordless play often has the preference, but only for reasons of convenience—because the entertainment is shorter and cheaper, because one may enter at any moment, and because a man may smoke. In short, the picture house is a makeshift; the play is still the thing.

The Psychology of Lancashire.

Touching the question of the psychology of the Lancastrian, however, in its larger aspects, if we ask ourselves what manner of man and woman they are who have converted, within a measurable space of time, a bleak, desolate, and in many places inhospitable, region into a human hive, humming with industry and prosperity, we shall find ourselves face to face with a knotty problem. Certain characteristics are common to all Lancastrians—at the same time there are great individual divergencies. First comes, as a blessing or a curse, an insatiable energy, restless, unappeasable. Then, an intense promptness and practicality of mind. What is done must be done now, done well and done for a purpose. Difficulties must be overcome. Hence, out of this necessity arises an inventiveness of mind, an adaptability of resource, which results in the development of mechanical genius, a love of new and strange ways, a desire for adventure, an eagerness to take risks, with a determination to accomplish—if not in one way, then in some other way. A robust individuality such as this inevitably produces a freedom and an independence of manner and speech, and a certain aggressiveness and hardiness of temperament.

"Rough and Ready."

The Lancastrian is said to be "rough and ready." Rough, yes, but as ready to do a generous act as to strike a blow.

When we go North, we marvel that any people should so neglect the refinements of social life as to, seemingly, strain the truth in order to get in a sting under the skin. Dour faces we dislike, dour theology we hate. Thus we return, with more contentment in our hearts than that with which we set out.

When we go South, we are won over by the anxiety of people to move in quite a different direction; to, seemingly, strain the truth in order to say an agreeable thing. When we come to realise that smoothness of speech is a convention, a matter of training, we find it hard to distinguish a mere social trait from downright insincerity—or worse. Thus we return, once more, with more contentment in our hearts than that with which we set out.

We love to think of Lancashire as the happy mean between these two extremes. The "roughness" is only our inveterate habit of looking at facts straight in the face. For colour or polish, with which to disguise reality, we have no use; we want the truth. And if we are rough, we are never consciously cruel; if we are self-centred, we are never so wrapt up in our own affairs as to have only deaf ears for the cry of suffering; if we are aggressive in our daily conflict with the world, it is only because we are taking no unnecessary risks, and we are not sure if the moment has come for the sheathing of the sword; if we are proud of our "brass," it is only because we know at what immense cost success has been achieved; and if we worship prosperity, it is only because our whole soul revolts at the idea of dependence. Meanness of mind, of heart, or of pocket, was never one of our failings.

A Freer Life.

Employers and employed in the mills and ironworks address each other in the vernacular and by their Christian names. Nowhere, without exception, are the rights of women to an equality of consideration so readily admitted as in Lancashire. Among such a people there is a freer life in all relationships than would be understood in other English counties, and religion, politics, social activities—everything that holds a community together—have to be on a manly and independent basis. Nowhere will be found such firm friends, such loyal sons and daughters.

The Great War.

A feature of this volume is a collection of some ten thousand names of those elder boys of the public schools of Lancashire who have joined the Navy and Army since the outbreak of the Great War, in August, 1914.

The Editor of this volume tells me that every effort has been made to render this great Roll of Honour of permanent historic value, by adding to it the latest information obtainable up to the moment of going to press, showing what fortune has attended each man in the sphere of activity to which he has been called—on the sea, or in the field, whether killed, wounded, or promoted. It is a list of which many a small nation, cast in like circumstance, might well be proud. No county in England can equal, let alone outrival, the noble response of Lancashire to the clarion call; and no section of the county can claim a higher place in the esteem of his fellow-countrymen than the public school boy.

Proud of our Men.

We are proud of out county, of our men, of our schools. We fondly believe the quality of blood was in our boys when they first went to school. We are sure that every quality of that blood was strengthened and purified by the instruction and example set by the masters of our public schools, of which sound scholarship and high principle were integral features. Whether in the class-room, or on the playing field, the rule is always the same—modesty in the flush of success, good humour in the face of misfortune.

The result is now before our eyes—that of which our hearts required no telling. Even our enemy has yielded his praise—on the field of battle the instinct of the sportsman never deserted any one of our men.

Heroes All.

We mourn our stricken heroes. They have engraved on the tablets of everlasting memory a record of great deeds, and lives nobly spent. Theirs be Lancashire's proud name, and England's glory. To those, who wounded, still live to tell their tale of valour, we say: "It is not permitted to any man to bear a more honourable scar than that incurred in this conflict. It is our duty—nay, it is our proud privilege—to make the way of your going smooth." To those others who, happily, are still with us, and are destined to emerge unscathed, we trust to be permitted at the end to say: "You are favoured above all your fellows, inasmuch as you risked much, and saved all."

W. R. H. C.

POSTCRIPT.—To the criticism that in framing this backward glance I have been guided by no true sense of proportion, awarding minute attention to a comparative trifle, and summarily dismissing in a few lines a subject of national importance, I would reply that such a view is largely based in a misconception of my purpose. I have attempted nothing in the nature of a history of Lancashire. I merely have sought to echo, as it were, the conversation round any Lancashire dinner-table, when men and women, young and old, have been minded to review the growth of the county, largely in the light of the service of their own families thereto.

Do we apply a microscope to the contribution of our own people? Then I have sinned with many. Do we use a telescope when we contemplate the work of a neighbour, taking care to reverse this instrument before we apply our eye? Then I have offended yet again, and with many more. But, even so, these distortions of vision are only the inveterate habit of human nature. In Lancashire we are very human.

The county is so big, so varied, and so populous, that where the family point of view does not operate, the locality point of view usually takes its place. "We are the people," says the Big City. "It is our energy that is moving the ship along," replies the Little Town.

I beg the reader, therefore, to regard my story of Lancashire as simply "my story"—as giving expression to the opinions of one individual and no more; as reviving fragments of memory that have not yet found, in many instances, their exact place and precise status in the grave domain of sober history; as telling the tale of the people as distinct from the records of government or the chronicles of the land.—W. George Forrester and Co., Vauxhall Foundry, Liverpool. After serving the last four years of apprenticeship, began what was to prove a brilliant and uninterrupted connection with the White Star Line, by joining the shore staff at the latter end of 1881. In 1886, at the age of twenty-four, took certificate as chief engineer, and five years later, in 1891, became chief engineer on the S.S. Cufic. In 1895 the White Star appointed Mr. Bruce to the vacant post of Assistant Superintendent Engineer. There were no fewer than four hundred applicants to choose from, and the fact of Mr. Willett Bruce beating so many and excellent candidates is a testimony to his worth. In September, 1904, he became Superintendent Engineer in succession to Mr. S. G. Horsburgh. Mr. Bruce was now in a position of vast responsibility, but his scope was destined even to greater extensions. Early in 1911, to his duties as Superintendent of the White Star Line, were added those of Superintendent to the American and Dominion Line. He therefore, to-day, superintends all machinery, etc., of a fleet which, for tonnage and indicated horse-power, is one of the very largest in the world. Retired Chief Engineer, Royal Naval Reserve; fifteen years on active list, ten years on retired list; but eligible until fifty-five years of age for active service if called out for a case of emergency. Mr. W. Bruce is not without fame as an inventor, and one type of whistle operator he brought out was an enormous success. He has also invented a silent blow-off, to help to prevent the objectionable noise in the head of the waste-steam pipe when the ship suddenly slows down.

of the Magic Isle" (1913); numerous articles and pamphlets dealing with Gaelic mythology, Manx politics, etc. (1909-1916); "Are we Making the Most of the Land?"; "The Mananan Myth" (1916). Recreations: Golf, travel, book, silver and curio collecting, music. Clubs: Fort Anne (Douglas), Peel, etc. Masonic Lodge: Highbury (London), No. 2192 (Organist, 1906-1910). Career: Fellow of the Société Internationale de Philologie (President, 1915-1916); writer on anthropology, philology, mythology, and kindred subjects; one of three children of a marriage, all of whom are, or have been, in the public eye. John, the father, the son of a farmer, was born at Ballacrye, Ballaugh, Isle of Man, in 1821, and, after passing most of his years in Liverpool, where he initiated penny readings for working-men, and rendered yeoman service to the Oddfellows' movement, died at Greeba Castle, Isle of Man, the residence of his eldest son, the well-known novelist, in 1904. Sarah, the mother, descended from a Quaker family of china potters, long settled in Northumberland, but which, in the eighteenth century, migrated into the adjoining county of Cumberland, was born in 1828, and died at her daughter's residence, Maida Vale, London, in 1912. All the children of this marriage (celebrated at Liverpool in 1851) are Lancastrians by education and the potent influence of environment during early years. Only the two younger, however, are Lancastrians by birth: William Ralph Hall Caine, and Lily Hall Caine (the "Glory Quayle" of her elder brother's play, "The Christian"), both born in the Hundred of West Derby, Liverpool. (The latter died at Aldershot, Surrey, May 31st, 1914.) W. R. Hall Caine was first employed in a newspaper office, whilst still in his teens, in the capacity of amanuensis to the late John Lovell, the Editor-Manager of the Liverpool Mercury. The absorption of his chief in outside political work gave to his secretary the free and unfettered use of a considerable library of costly reference books, an insight of the making and use of commonplace books, and ample time to avail himself of a vast mass of the most modern information regarding history, law, science, invention, discovery, mechanics, trade, biography, morals, etc. Lovell attached the highest value to a column headed "Answers to Correspondents," a feature almost unique in a daily paper. The secretary began by an occasional appearance among these often lengthy "Answers," but ultimately became its chief support, contributing advice in the accepted parental style, as well as facts, strange and wonderful, on every subject under the sun (but chiefly on points of interest in relation to some present-day topic), gathered partly from the voluminous library in his charge, but often amplified by information from experts far and wide. Thereafter, he became a recognised member of the editorial staff, a regular contributor to the review and leader columns, chiefly on trade and finance topics, and a writer for the Harmsworth Press in London. Granted the special privilege of "leave of absence" (by which his Liverpool post always remained open to him), he removed to London, organised the official advertising campaign of the Isle of Man Legislature, and for a while occupied a somewhat analogous position in the service of Messrs. Waring and Gillow, Ltd. Thereafter confined himself to journalistic work; edited the Court Circular, Household Words, and other publications; wrote on politics, history, etc., for certain of the sixpenny weekly papers, including The Saturday Review, The Literary World, The Theatre, St. Paul's, etc., and was for some time Director and Manager of Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons, Ltd., Shorthand and Education Publishers. As a guest of Sir Alfred Jones, K.C.M.G., President of the British Cotton Growing Association, was one of the party overtaken by the earthquake in Jamaica, 1907, and wrote vivid narratives of that stirring episode for the Daily Mail and the New York Times. For the space of a few moments in his life he had the close attention of the civilised world. Has travelled over most of Europe, parts of Africa, the West Indies, Canada and the United States; residing of late years at Yarmouth (Isle of Wight), Limpsfield (Surrey), and Douglas (Isle of Man).

CROOK, Thomas, J.P., Cotton Shipper.

Rosedale, Burnley. Office: c/o C. R. Boyce, 8, Exchange Street, Manchester. Born: May 11th, 1855, at Burnley; eldest son of Thomas and Alice Crook. Educated: Carlton Road School, Burnley. Occupation: Cotton Shipper. Appointments: J.P. for Burnley; Local Correspondent of Intelligence Committee on Distress and Unemployment of Local Government Board. Member, Burnley Literary and Scientific Club, and writes on economic subjects. Recreations: Literary pursuits, walking, gardening. Club: Mechanics' Institute, Burnley. Career: Is now the Manager, in England, of a firm of Southern Cotton Shippers. After a successful career as a cotton manufacturer, he retired from that branch of the business and turned his attention to the solving of the problem of supplying spinners with their raw material by more direct and less expensive methods than those hitherto in force. The success of his efforts are now manifest in the increasing business of Messrs. Boyce and Co., Cotton Shippers, of 8, Exchange Street, Manchester, and Memphis, Tennessee, the firm referred to above, the business of which Mr. Crook may be said to have established. In his younger days, after the usual commercial education given to middle-class youth, Mr. Crook received a thorough training in the practical and technical part of both spinning and weaving in his father's own mills. He commenced business as a Cotton Manufacturer on his own account in 1881, retiring in 1902. He was shortly afterwards appointed the first Secretary of the Burnley Chamber of Commerce, then being formed, which position he held about four years; he was elected Vice-President of that body on his resignation of the Secretaryship, and is now serving a second term of office. As delegate of the Burnley Chamber, he attended the Congress of Chambers of Commerce of the Empire, at Montreal, Canada, in 1903, and it was on this visit to the other side of the Atlantic that friendships were formed with men connected with the shipping of cotton from the Southern States, and which rendered it possible for Mr. Crook to put his ideas of direct shipment of cotton to spinners into practice. In this enterprise his previous experience of spinning enabled him to judge of the right quality of cotton suitable for the spinning of various counts of yarn (fine or coarse, weft or twist), and proved very useful as a starting-point. Lancashire spinners are famous for their alertness in adopting improvements, whether commercial or mechanical. They were not slow to perceive the advantage of the new system Mr. Crook introduced, and it is to their enterprising spirit, coupled with the splendid buying connection organised by Mr. Boyce in the South, that the success of the movement is due. Mr. Crook has always been fond of the study of economic questions, and is now recognised as an authority on these subjects, more especially such as bear on any branch of the cotton business. He was a member of the Burnley Corporation for some years, and appointed a Justice of the Peace in 1909.

Spital Old Hall, Spital. 'Phone: 20 Bromborough. Telegrams: Bromborough. Office: 56, Hanover Street, Liverpool. Born: June 26th, 1846, at Birkenhead; son of Edward Evans, J.P., D.L., of Wrexham, and Margaret Evans (both deceased). Educated: Wallace Hall, Dumfriesshire; and privately. Married: May 20th, 1869, to Martha, daughter of William Nevett Marton, Salop, and has issue two sons and three daughters: Edward, John, Gertrude Mary, Margaret, Rose Noeline (married to Major Vernon Thorne, 9th Batt., Lancs. Fusiliers). Occupation: Director and Vice-Chairman of Evans, Sons, Lescher and Webb, Ltd., Liverpool, London, and New York. Appointment: J.P. for County of Chester. Recreations: Golf and billiards. Clubs: The Reform; National Liberal; Liverpool Reform and Junior Reform; Glasgow Liberal. Career: He is probably one of the best-known men in Liverpool and the Hundred of Wirral. He may justly be called the father of the Liberal Party in Wirral, for so long ago as 1865 he was engaged in political warfare in the Borough of Birkenhead. In 1880, when the West Cheshire Division—which has since been sub-divided into the Wirral, Eddisbury, Crewe, and Northwich Divisions—was contested by the Liberal Party, for the first time for forty years, Sir Edward took a most active part in the contest, and as Hon. Secretary of the Division visited every township and hamlet in this area, creating an organisation where hitherto none had existed. In 1885, on the Redistribution, which called into being the Wirral Division, he was appointed Hon. Secretary of the Wirral Liberal Association. In 1887 he was elected Chairman of the Wirral Liberal Association, and retained that office till 1900. Whilst in office, the subscribers' list was raised from about 60 in number to 806. In 1889 he initiated and carried into being the Liverpool Liberal Federal Council, the largest Borough Federation in the country, with an electorate of 115,000. He was elected President on July 19th, 1889, and re-elected to that position each year, till 1911, when he resigned. On June 4th, 1889, he was elected a Member of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal Federation, the principal organisation of the Party in the country, and on November 10th, 1894, he was elected to the Chairmanship of that important body, to which position he has been annually re-elected ever since. He has received the honour which is due to the strenuous public worker, first by being elevated to the Bench as a Justice of the Peace for the Wirral Petty Sessional Division in 1894, and second, by having received from His Majesty the King the honour of Knighthood in 1906. The Liberal Party has presented him with his portrait, painted by Mr. Frank T. Copnall (and a handsome diamond pendant to Lady Evans), the presentation being made by Mr. Asquith, then Prime Minister, who came to Liverpool for the purpose. The portrait is now on the walls of Reform Club, and a replica at Spital. He has also received handsome acknowledgments at various periods from the Liberal Party in Liverpool and Wirral and from his colleagues on Committee of National Liberal Federation. In all his strenuous work he has received the cordial sympathy of his wife and family, who have at all times assisted him in his labours.

Has had the choice of various elected offices, but has always preferred to work single-handed for the public good. Owns land at Hest Bank, near Lancaster, and Morecambe, formerly developed by him, and at Bolton-le-Sands. The family surname is generally much-misunderstood, probably because it is so simple, and Old English, and was formerly common round Morecambe Bay. It is merely Muckle, or Mickle, "much"; Mitchell and Machell are variants; "Mucel" was the original form. His fore-elders were for centuries Yeomen in the large parish of Warton, including Carnforth. Mrs. Agnes Muckalt, the mother, was a daughter of Thomas Watson Bainbridge, also a landowner in the same parish, and her parents, on both sides, owned the land where Carnforth Station stands, and the Bainbridges have been owners in Carnforth since, and before, the Norman period.

The firm was unaltered until after the death of Mr. Gittins when, in 1866, Mr. Winder was taken into partnership, and the firm became Richardson and Winder. It was a time of great financial crisis and panic, owing to the failure of Overend, Gurney and Co. In 1893 Mr. Winder took his son Arthur into partnership, and the firm became J. E. Winder and Son. Since the death of Mr. J. H. Lancashire in 1913, he has been the oldest member and "father" of the Manchester Stock Exchange. He served on the Committee for about twenty-five years, but resigned in 1899. When a young man, he was interested for some years in parish work in connection with St. Peter's Church, Oldham Road, Manchester. At the time of the cotton famine in 1862, he became Honorary Secretary of the Relief Committee, formed in connection with St. Peter's Parish, Oldham Road. The distress which, it was anticipated, would be over in a few weeks' time, lasted about fifteen months. For a period of twenty-four years Mr. Winder was a Director of the Freeholders' (Bramhall Estate) Company. On July 5th, 1916, Mr. Winder completed his jubilee as a member of the Manchester Stock Exchange. He continues to take an active interest in his profession.

ASSOCIATION OF LANCASTRIANS IN LONDON.

BAINES, Thomas, Solicitor, Clerk to the Wandsworth Justices, Hon. Sec. of the Association of Lancastrians in London.

1, Gresham Buildings, Guildhall, London, E.C. 2. Born at Carnforth. Educated at a private school in Lancaster. Articled in Lancashire. Came to London in 1885 to complete his articles and for his final examination, intending to return to Lancashire to start practice there. An opportunity, however, occurred for him to join the firm of Wetherfield, Son and Baines, and he is now principal partner. Soon after the foundation of the Association of Lancastrians in London, in 1892, Mr. Baines became a member of the Association, and ultimately its Chairman. On the retirement of Mr. J. R. Hosker as Honorary Secretary, he was requested to accept that office, which he has held now for several years, and associated himself closely with Lancastrian life in London. Four Lord Mayors in succession of the City of London have been Lancastrians, and all of them have been Presidents of the Association during their term of office. Mr. Baines has an active interest in local municipal life and for some years was a member of the Borough Council of Wandsworth. He became Chairman of various Committees, and was elected Mayor of that Borough, but at that time he was unable to accept the honour, owing to pressure of his own business. He has contested two elections for a seat on the Common Council of the City of London, and he is now the Clerk to the Justices of the Wandsworth Division of London. He has allied himself to all kinds of sports, and has taken special interest in the game of bowls, assisting in the formation of the English Bowling Association, and for ten years past has been the Secretary of that Association, and been successful in bringing over to this country teams of Bowlers from Canada, Australia and New Zealand, who have toured the whole of the British Isles. He has also many activities outside his own legal business, and has recently, in conjunction with Mr. W. Murray Ellis, the Honorary Secretary, been successful in founding, and is now the Solicitor of, the "Latin America Chamber of Commerce in Great Britain," with which many well-known Lancashire firms are connected. The Honourable Arthur Stanley, M.P., is the Vice-President, and Sir Charles Wakefield, Bart., Sir Joseph Lawrence, and Sir Robert Perks are also Vice-Presidents, the object of the Chamber being, in co-operation with the Ministers and Consuls of the various South American States and Mexico, to promote British trade with these Republics and combat the trade organisations of Germany there. A feature of the Chamber is the establishment of a trade newspaper, The British and Latin America Trade Gazette, of which Mr. Baines is part-editor, and which is at present the only trade paper in the world with separate and simultaneous editions published every month in the English, Spanish, and Portuguese languages.

TOO LATE FOR CLASSIFICATION.

PULLON, Capt. Philip George.
